Union service will be held in the Congregational church next Sunday evening with the M. E. pastor as the speaker. Mr. Tompkinson's subject will be "People of Whom We Ought To Think Better." There are a great many people in this world of ours who never get the credit that is due them. Can you think of any? The M. E. pastor says he knows a lot. Interest in the Union services is increasing.

The Tennis Club of Rowan will hold a tennis social on their grounds next Saturday. This will be open for the public, and ice cream and candy will be served. IT CURED HER

Not a hundred miles from Folkstone a few months ago, a wife lay very ill. Having brought up a clever orphan girl, the sick woman called the young woman to her, and said: "I shall soon leave my little children motherless. They know you and love you, and after I am gone I want you and my husband to marry."

The young woman, bursting into tears, said: "We were just talking about that."

The wife recovered.—Exchange.

EAGLE GROVE MARSHAL FOILS A SUICIDE ATTEMPT

News—Burt F. Norris, whose home is in Loognoote, Indiana, but has been living in Eagle Grove for some time, bought a bottle of carbolic acid Monday evening and was foiled in a suicide attempt by the Eagle Grove city marshal, Mr. Reynolds.

Norris bought some new clothes at an Eagle Grove store and told the clerk the next day he'd know why the new clothes were wanted. Then he played a few games of pool and walked to the rear of the pool hall to drink his carbolic acid.

But Norris had been talking queerly, telling some of his friends that a man was trying to shoot him, and the marshal had been told of his actions, so he walked right behind him to the rear of the building and as Norris took the bottle out of his pocket the marshal grabbed it.

Norris' father lives in Indiana and was notified to come and get his son, whose mind is believed to be slightly deranged.

CLEANING HOUSE AT JEWELL AND ELLSWORTH

Jewel and Ellsworth are going to lock the stable door after the horse has been stolen. The people knew a pretty wild bunch had a rendezvous out at a public dance hall between the two towns that booze runners and wild women were holding high carnival there most of the time. But the public didn't seem to give a hang for their carrying-on. Not until a few weeks ago did they pay any particular business of the average father. But when two young girls were branded with the scarlet letter and one of them suicided to hide her shame, and two of the boys of Jewell, aged sixteen, were held responsible for the girls' troubles, why then the people got busy and decided that to clean up the whole miserable business was the proper thing to do. At the core, American ideals are pretty sound, altho the surface of our lives is somewhat fly-specked and worm-eaten. The trouble is that every fellow figures that so long as he isn't troubled with the miserable mess that slack morality brings in its wake it is none of his business. But the wrecking of two young lives like the instance at Jewell brings the public to a deeper realization of its responsibility and the individual to a consciousness of his part of the blame. So Ellsworth and Jewell people are rolling up their sleeves and are going to clean house awhile.—Clarion News.

LANDLORD AND RENTER CLASH

Mr. and Mrs. Bruno Weers, who live in Oseola township, a short distance from Ackley, hailed into the court of Justice of the Peace Sharpe last Monday on a charge of threatening to do corporal injury to Fred W. Clawson, who also resides near Ackley. The Weers, who came to this country a few ag from Holland and have as yet only only barely learned the American language, lease a farm from Clawson, and when he went to the place recently to collect his rent Mr. Weer was either unable to pay or refused to pay him and told Clawson to get off the place and not come back.

It is stated that Mrs. Weers threatened to stab Clawson to death frist with the ax, then the pitchfork, and finally she picked up a club and threatened to stab him with that. Of course she would have been unable to stab him with a club, but her confusion and ignorance of the American language caused her to get her vocabulary crossed.

Mr. and Mrs. Weer, followed a conference here, agreed to pay the costs of the case, and they were given to understand that in the United States people are not allowed to go about making threats on other people's lives and telling them that they should be killed if they were ever seen alone. —Hampton Chronicle.

CORWITH MUDER CASE AGAIN IN LIMELIGHT

OnAugust 31, last year, the body of Glen Wildman, a young man about nineteen years of age, was found in a barn on a farm that he had been operating near Corwith. The circumstaces regarding his death were rather mysterious and it was reported that he was found lying upon the floor of the barn dead, his body in death form covered with a horse blanket. In one hand he held a 32 calibre revolver. A bullet hole in his head evidently caused his death. The barn was said to have been locked from the outside when the body was discovered and everything pointed to his having committed suicide. Officers worked upon the case and apparently suspicion rested upon the brother who found the body but when the was presented to the grand jury it was considered insufficent evidence for an indictment. A note was found that said something about intended suicide. This note was questioned and an expert on hand writing pronounced it the hand writing of the deceased, so for a time the matter was dropped. Evidently the brother was not satisfied and thru his demands the state has again taken up the matter and men have been working on the case for several weeks. The brother and other relatives of the family maintain he is innocent and have at all times although the evidence is such that they themselves believe a crime was committed and are anxious to learn the truth.

Young Wildman stood well in the community and his death was a great shock to his friends. If a murder was committed they want to know it and in justice to the suspicioned he should be vindicated of the awful charge if the new evidence that has been secured will do it.—Algona Republican.

HOG MARKET BREAKS LAST WEER

The sharp break in the hog market last week caused considerable anxiety among the producers, but when the facts of the situation are known it becomes evident that a slump in prices was unvoidable. Good prices paid for hogs have attracted heavy receipts, and while August has generally been a light hog receiving month, figures thus far this month show that receipts have broken all records at the leading markets. Last week's Chicago receipts totalled around 120,000 hogs, which is about 20,000 more than the ten-year average for the same week. These liberal receipts, which were far beyond the demand, and the big break in provisions during the week are the principal reasons given for the break.

Although export demand for pork has kept up, the runs were too heavy for good prices to hold, but if lighter runs prevail during the latter part of this month, it is likely that a change for the better will be brought about. However, hogs are still high above the level of corn prices and will show a good profit at present market prices.

"The Way To Wealth"

Says Franklin, "is as plain as the road to the market. Our failures are not caused by not knowing what to do, or how to do it, but because of the lack of will to do what we ought—lack of determination. Every man knows that he ought to save—almost every man can save, but lacks the will to start saving. So he lives on, spending money as fast as he earns it—but he's nothing to show for it.

Belmond, Kanawha, Lake Mills and Mason City are the four teams who will do battle at the base ball tournament to be held at that place next week.

The Belmond ball team went down to Dows on Tuesday afternoon of this week and met the heavily loaded team from that place, and incidently defeat to the tune of 6 to 2. It was justly deserved, for they took a team composed of men who hadn't played together all summer, and some who hadn't played at all before. Louie Baldridge pitched for Belmond the first five or six innings, when he was removed and Pillmer put in. Aside from the first man or two up after Pillmer went in there was nothing doing for Dows. Cort Morse caught, Dave Luick playing short, and the rest were more or less experienced players, while Dows had a team composed partly of salaried men. The game was a farce.

FARM BUREAU NEWS ITEMS

TRANSPORTATION DEPARTMENT ACTIVE

Clifford Thorne, director of the Transportation Department, reports that the Interstate Commerce Commission is now considering the Farm Bureau's application for a general reduction in livestock rates thruout the west. The examiner who presided over the hearings has recommended a general reduction in any staple commodity thruout one-half or more of the United States ever recommended to the favorable consideration of the commission.

The Transportation department is preparing for presentation of the application for a general reduction in grain rates thruout the western portion of the United States. This case is assigned for hearing in Washington, D. C., before the Interstate Commerce Commission beginning on August 15th. Oral argument will be conducted at the close of the taking of testimony. President J. R. Howard will present the opening statement.

The Senate committee on Interstate commerce will hear from the shippers the last of August or the first of September. The hearing involves the proposed revision of the Transportation Act. Of special importance in this connection is section 15-A, which attempts to guarantee to the railroads a return of 5 1-2 or 6 percent above all taxes and operating expenses on the present value of the railroads. The farmer knows no such guarantee.'

The oral argument in the Kansas City Southern proceedings. One of the first test cases involving railroad valuation, has just been assigned for Oct. 6, to 8, in Kansas City.

The railroads have made an advance on switching charges for livestock shipments to the Chicago stock yards from $2 to $3 per car. The Farm Bureau has filed a complaint before the Interstate commerce commission asking that the carriers reduce this charge to $2.50 per car. The hearing will be in Chicago on Sept. 8. If the farmers are successful the saving to the shippers will amount to from $500 to $1,000 per day.

THREE THOUSAND ATTEND PICNIC

One of the largest community picnics ever held in the vicinity of Dows was staged at the Dows community park Thursday, August 18, when three thousand or more people of that community, coming from Morgan and Oakland townships of Franklin county, from Blaine and Vernon townships of Wright county, and the people from the city of Dows met for a good old get-together picnic.

The program of the day opened with a splendid address of welcome by Mr. R. W. Birdsall from Dows, which was followed by a mixed program consisting of several musical numbers by the Tri-Star quintette of Dows, several recitations and readings and two selections from the community chorus, after which the picnicers enjoyed the open air banquet in the picnic grove.

The afternoon program began with selections by the Tri-Star quintette which were followed by selections by a ladies' quartette and by the male quartette. Short talks were then given by County Agent Edwards of Wright county and County Agent McNie of Franklin county, after which the speaker of the day was introduced. Mr. A. J. Shinn of Woodbine, Harrison county, gave the principal address of the day. Mr. Shinn talked for an hour and a half on the agricultural problems of the day, laying special emphasis at all times on the necessity of the closest co-operation among the farmers themselves and the farming community with the town community. Mr. Shinn is a splendid example of a horny-handed toiler of the soil, a farmer who has made a thoro study of agricultural problems and who is capable of expressing his ideas before an intelligent audience. Mr. Shinn came as a substitute for J. F. Coupe, assistant secretary of the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation, but no apologies need be made for the high class address which he delivered at the picnic.

An athletic program consisting of boxing, horseshoe pitching, racing and baseball was enjoyed by all. The baseball game between Dows and Rowen seemed to feature the athletic program. The two teams seemed to be well matched and everyone enjoyed the exhibition of baseball which the boys staged that afternoon.

The business men of Dows and the farmers of the four towships immediately surrounding Dows are to be congratulated upon the splendid spirit of cop-operation which made this community picnic such a great success. In order to make the picnic a success the business men of Dows closed their places of business for the day, in addition to contributing financially toward the affair. It will be remembered that this picnic was planned and organized by five committees, each of which had one representative from each of the four townships and one representative from the city of Dows.

WOOLSTOCK SOCIAL AT KIRSTEIN HOME

The J. E. Kirstein home about nine miles southwest of Clarion, was the scene of a lively community gathering Friday evening, August 19, when the regular monthly social of Woolstock township was held. The Kirstein home was packed to overflowing by the farmers of the community who gathered to enjoy the program which was prepared and staged by people of their own community.

The program of the evening was in the nature of a musical affair. The evening's entertainment opened with several numbers by the community chorus followed by a violin duet, a piano duet and several vocal solos. The musical program was followed by a splendid address by Mr. Patton, one of the substantial farmers of Blaine township.

Mr. Evan Patton, of Dows, Blaine township, was the speaker of the occasion. Mr. Patton gave a general farm bureau talk touching upon the present activities of the state and national farm bureau federations. He spoke in particular of the legislation accomplishments of the Farm Bureau and urged the closest co-operation among the farmers in supporting their organization at this time when the organization is in need of loyal support from every individual member.

CO-OPERATORS SHIP FIFTY THOUSAND CARS

Iowa's co-operative livestock shipping associations in 1920 handled a grand total of 50,000 cars of cattle, hogs and sheep. That is an average of practically seventy-seven cars per year for each of the six hundred and forty-seven associations which were found doing business last year. About half of the farmers of the state do more or less shipping thu these organizations.

These facts and many others of interest were found in Iowa by E. G. Nourse of the Iowa Agricultural Experiment station.

Generally these associations were formed to eliminate unnecessary expense in shipping livestock, particularly the profits taken by private shippers. While many private shippers take only a fair margin for their work, some associations estimate that thru co-operative shipping they save as much as seventy-five cents or a dollar a hundred on shipments. Mr. Nourse's investigation leads to the conclusion that the latter figure is too large when a year's business is considered, he puts the saving at nearer seventy-five cents a hundredweight, with an average of not to exceed 35 cents. At the lower figure however, the saving would be about $55 per car or about two million, seven hundred fifty thousand dollars for all the cars shipped co-operatively in 1920.

WILL FIGHT HIGH INTEREST RATES

Excessive interest rates on farm mortgages and also excessive charges for commissions for making loans are among the complaints which are being received by Senator Kenyon at Washington from various places in Iowa. Letters of this kind are received by the senator almost every day.

Complaints are made of interest rates over 6 per cent and of commission as high as 7 per cent. The senator intends to call the situation to the attention of the senate in the course of the debate on the farm export financing bill.

Senator Kenyon holds it is especialy important that the federal goverment through the farm loan system and the war finance corporation as well as the reserve system liberalize credit for the farmers, and thus make extortion by private loan interests impossible.

Enactment is now assured of the bill authorizing a rate of 5 1 2 per cent on bonds of the farm loan and joint stock land bank system. The senate has passed this bill and the house has taken it up for final action.

Demand for the legislation has been strong in Iowa on the theory that if the rate on these bonds is increased they can be sold and thus money can be raised to enable the farm loan system to function.

AUGUST GARDEN REMINDERS

Much work faces the gardener this month; as a rule the weather is extremely hot, while periods of drought very often accompany the heat, with the result that under certain conditions plant life suffers. Where the soil is deep and contains plenty of humus, sufficent moisture will be maintained if te surface is regularly stirred to create a dust mulch. On light soils deficient in humus, regular watering may be necessary, and a mulch of lawn clippings or short manure will also help the plants to come safely through this period. The garden will be looking its best and summer flowers at the full height of their beauty but to keep them doing well, hoeing, watering or mulching must not be neglected.

Are you practicing succession cropping? If there are any vacant spaces in the garden quite a number of vegetables may yet be started. For instance, bush beans, the snap varieties sown early in August, usually give a good account of themselves in this vicinity— Philadelphia. They should be ready for use in from fifty to sixty days from sowing. Early peas sown now do well if they can be kept free from the green fly, which in some seasons plays havoc with the vines Beets, corn salad, kohl-rabi, lettuce, Chinese cabbages, radishes, spinach and turnips may olso be sown. Young, tender vegetables towards the end of the season can only be had by making successional sowings. If soil and weather be dry, moisture must be given to germinate the seeds; therefore the soil should be thoroughly soaked and kept moist until the seedlings are well up.

The gardener generally looks upon the pruning of fruit trees as purely winter work, but much of this work might be done more comfortable now, and with greater profit.

The earlier raspberries are pruned within reason, so much greater will be the supply of berries next season. Immediately the crop has been gathered, pruning should be carried out by removing all canes which carried fruit this season. This will greatly benefit the young shoots now springing from the base, as it will allow free admission of sun and air. It is advisable to reduce the shoots by the removal of the weakest, leaving only six or seven of the strongest on each plant. Those retained should be secured loosely to the available support, and as the ground between the rows will no doubt have been trodden hard, just point it over lightly with a fork, then give the entire patch a dressing of poultry or sheep manure, later hoeing it into the surface soil.

Blackberries should have the same attention and treatment, but the stronger young growths might be pruned back to some extent to insure a larger crop next year. It pays well to prune black-currant bushes after the last fruits have been gathered. In this instance pruning consists of removing as many of the old fruiting branches as possible without entirely denuding the bush. The early removal of this useless wood gives the young growth left a better chance of developing and ripening. All young growths of the black currant must be left full length for this is next season's fruiting wood. Allow all suckers from the base of the bush to grow, for next year they will carry fruit along their entire length. After pruning, clean out all weeds, fork over the ground, and give it a dressing of manure or fertilizer.

Preparation should be made for the new strawberry bed. Get the ground in readiness so that the plants are ready. The onion crop will be ready for harvesting this month. Avoid allowing them to remain in the ground after the tops turn yellow. Pull them and leave in the sun for a day or two, then remove the tops and spread out thinly under cover until they mature. Then pack in baskets or crates for storing.

Keep all flowers picked; if allowed to produce seed, the plant will quickly deteriorate and further brooming for the season ceases.

August is a good time to plant evergreen shrubs, provided they can be moved with a good ball of moist soil adhering to the roots. Do not let up spraying or dusting; as the cabbage worm is often very troublesome at this time, dust the heads with lime or spray with arsenate.—Country Gentleman.

SURE, THEY HAD A "BLISSFUL" TIME

Under the heading "Friday's Game A Frost," the News had the following to say, in part:

"Never before had the fans witnessed such a disgusting exhibition of crabbing and useless beefing.  It was a continual jangle on Webster City's part over nothin.  Webster City staged the most disgusting exhibition of lack of sportsmanship that has ever been seen on the local diamond, and the game should have been called on them from the start.  The fans, expecting to see a good game of ball, were disgusted, and many of them went off the field. If Webster City sends out such "crabbers" as they had here, the writer hopes they never appear again on the local diamond."

Same Old Story But a Good One.

Mrs. Mahala Burns, Savanna, Mo., relates an experience, the like of which has happened in almost every neighborhood in this country, and has been told and related by thousands of others, as follows: "I used a bottle of Chamberlian's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy about nine years ago and it cured me of flux (dysentery). I had another attack of the same complaint three or four years ago and a few doses of this remedy cured me. I have recommended it to dozens of people since I first used it and shall continue to do so for I know it is a quick and positive cure for bowel troubles."

ENFORCE AUTO LIGHTING LAWS

All Lights Must Have Lens Approved By Highway Commission

Statewide enforcement of the automobile headlight law will be undertaken September 1st.

Within the past few days notices to this effect have been mailed to every county treasurer in the state. Lists of lenses which the state highway Commission have thus far passed on and approved have also been mailed.

Furthermore, that the manufacturer must include with each set of lenses all such stipulations as to installations as may be made by the Iowa State Highway Commission in placing the lens upon an approved list, together with such exlanatory matter as will enable the buyer to install the lenses strictly in accordance with such stipulation.

Must Have Tilt

All lenses must be installed with an initial tilt sufficient to cause the axis of the beams to be horizontal under the condition of load, which will cause the maximum upward reflection of the beam. The headlights on all Fords taking current from the flywheel generator, must be tilted nine inches per 75 feet in addition to the above specified initial tilt.

The dimmer requirements are set forth in section 25 of the motor vehicles law. The section on dimmers was revised somewhat by the last legislature.

Dimmers Required

It now declares that auto lights shall be of sufficient illuminating power to be visible at a distance of 500 feet and to "reveal any persons, vehicle or substantial object seventy-five feet ahead of the lamps."

Other provisions of the law include: "It shall be unlawful to use on a vehicle of any kind any lighting device of over four candle power, equipped with a reflector, unless the same shall be so designed or arranged that the directly reflected and undiffused beam of such light when measured seventy-five feet or more ahead of the light shall not rise above forty-two inches from the level surface on which the vehicle stands under all conditions of load."

Spotlight Rules

"If a spotlight is used on a motor vehicle it shall be unlawful for any person to direct its rays toward the eyes of the driver or occupants of an approaching vehicle, or to the left of the center of the traveled way when meeting another vehicle.

"No person shall operate a motor vehicle on any highway of this state equipped with an electric bulb or other lightng devices of a greater capacity than thirty-two candle power, no matter how the same may be shaded, covered or obscured.

"Any person who shall turn all or any of his motor vehicle's lights off for the purpose of avoiding arrest or identification shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction subject to a fine of $100 or imprisonment for a period of not to exceed thirty days or both fine and imprisonment."

COP LOOKS; SNIFFS; AND IT'S REAL STUFF.

Hampton Chronicle: C. E. Schoppe who was recently fined $50 for bootlegging, is in the toils again, but this time he is likely to get something a little stronger than a mere fifty dollars. Last Saturday night Marshall Hooker saw what he believed was an attempt to deliver a bottle of booze from Schoppe to another party. He at once demanded a "look" at the bottle, but as quick as a flash Schoppe threw the bottle of booze out on the street—and the bottle did not break! Marshal Hooker went after the bottle, before it was smashed by a passing auto, and he discovered that it was the real thing—just by looking at the stuff.

Schoppe was placed under arrest and taken to the county jail, where he remained until his trial on Monday. An inspection of his place at the southwest edge of town was made by Marshall Hooker and Sheriff A. B. Atkinson, and they found two stills, ten gallons of mash, some "finished product" and the "hole in the ground" in a nearby field, where he had kept his surplus supply.

When Schoppe was fined $50 for bootlegging a few weeks ago a still was found in his place, but he was taken under a bootlegging charge at that time and given a light fine. The charged place against him now is that of selling and manufacturing liquor, and at his hearing before Judge Sharpe last Tuesday he pleaded guilty to the charge, but as the local court had no jurisdiction in this case he was bound over to the grand jury. He is out under a cash bond of $477. If indicted by the grand jury he will probably haveto pay a heavy fine, or possibly will be sentenced to a term jail inaddition to the fine.

A MAN FOR THE AGES

A STORY OF THE BUILDERS of DEMOCRACY

By IRVING BACHELLER

COPYRIGHT IRVING BACHELLER

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Samson and Sarah Traylor, with their two children, Josiah and Betsey, travel by wagon from their home in Vergennes, Vt., to the West, the land of plenty. Their destination is the Country of the Sangamon, in Illinois.

CHAPTER II.—At Niagara Falls they meet a party of immigrants, among them a youth named John McNeil, who also decides to go to the Sangamon country. All of the party suffer from fever and ague. Sarah's ministrations save the life of a youth, Harry Needles, in the last stages of fever, and he accompanies the Traylors. They reach New Salem, Illinois, and are welcomed by young "Abe" Lincoln.

CHAPTER III.—Among the Traylors' first acquaintances are Lincoln's friends, Jack Kelso and his pretty daughter Bim, 18 years of age.

CHAPTER IV.—Samson decides to locate at New Salem, and begins building his house. Led by Jack Armstrong, rowdies attempt to break up the proceedings. Lincoln thrashes Armstrong. Young Harry Needles strikes Bap McNoll, of the Armstrong crowd, and McNoll threatens vengeance.

CHAPTER V.—A few days later Harry, alone, is attacked by McNoll and his gang, and would have been roughly used had not Bim driven off his assailants with a shotgun. John McNeil, the Traylors' Niagara Falls acquaintance, is markedly attentive to Ann Rutledge. Lincoln is in love with Ann, but has never had enough courage to tell her so.

CHAPTER VI. — Traylor helps two slaves, who had run away from St. Louis, to escape. Eliphalet Biggs, owner of the slaves, following them, attempts to beat up Traylor and in a fight has his arm broken.

CHAPTER VII.—Waiting for his arm to heal, Biggs meets Bim Kelso, with whom Harry Needles has fallen in love. Biggs asks for Bim's hand, but her father refuses his consent. Biggs returns to St. Louis.

CHAPTER VIII.—Bim confesses to Harry that she loves Biggs, and the youth is disconsolate. Lincoln decides to seek a seat in the legislature. He and Harry volunteer for the Black Hawk war, and leave New Salem.

CHAPTER IX.—Biggs comes back to the village and he and Bim elope. Harry learns of it on his way home from the "war." Lincoln's advice and philosophy sustain him in his grief.

CHAPTER X.—Lincoln, defeated in his candidacy for the legislature, forms a partnership with "Bill" Berry in the grocery business. Biggs sends a gang to burn Traylor's house, but the New Salem men are warned and the raiders worsted.

CHAPTER XI.—Lincoln, now postmaster, decides to run again for the legislature. Ann Rutledge is openly in love with John McNeil. He leaves for his home in the East, promising to return soon and marry Ann. Lincoln accepts his defeat manfully. No word coming from McNeil, Ann confesses to Abe that his real name is McNamar, and her fears that he will not return. Lincoln in his deep love endeavors to reassure her, though he shares her misgivings. Lincoln wins his seat in the legislature.

CHAPTER XII.—Ann hears from McNamar, but his letter is cold and she is convinced he does not love her. She tells Abe of her doubt, and he confesses his love and asks her to marry him. Ann declares she does not yet love him, but will try to. With that promise Lincoln sets out for Vandalia and his legislative duties.

CHAPTER XIII.—Inspired by Elijah Lovejoy, Traylor arranges on his farm a hiding place for runaway slaves, a station on the "Underground Railroad."

CHAPTER XIV.—Ann agrees to marry Abe, but her health is wrecked. Three runaway slaves seek Traylor's help in escaping. They belong to Biggs and he comes in pursuit of them. Threatened with arrest for inciting the raid on Traylor, he flees. One of the fugitives is Bim in disguise. She has fled from her husband's cruelty.

CHAPTER XV.—Dying, Ann Rutledge calls for Abe, and he bids her farewell at her bedside. Following her demise a settled sadness descends on him. He is no longer "Abe," but "Abraham Lincoln."

CHAPTER XVI.—Overcoming his despondency, Lincoln returns to his work. Abolition sentiment is crystalizing and he throws himself into the movement.

CHAPTER XVII.—Traylor sells his farm and moves to Springfield. Lincoln plans to secure a divorce for Bim in order that she may marry Harry Needles, whom she has always really loved. McNamar returns to New Salem, too late.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Traylor and Harry Needles visit the "boom" city of Chicago, where Bim, now the mother of a son, is living with her parents. She has her divorce. Harry leaves for the Seminole war. An unscrupulous, rich speculator, Lionel Davis, desires to marry Bim, but she repulses him.

CHAPTER XIX.—Ruined by the panic of '37, Kelso dies and Bim and her mother are left penniless. Davis presses his suit, and, made desperate by the news of Harry's death, Bim almost makes up her mind to marry him.

CHAPTER XX.—Lincoln is admitted to the bar. Traylor ascertains that the report of Harry's death is false. He hurries to Chicago. Davis has swindled Brimstead, a friend of Traylor's, in real estate deals, and Traylor seeks to collect the money. Smallpox breaks out at Honey Creek, and Bim goes there as a nurse.

CHAPTER XXI.—Lincoln at Springfield enters into his life work. Harry Needles comes home and at once seeks Bim.

CHAPTER XXII.—Lincoln wins Brimstead's suit against Davis, thoroughly discrediting the speculator. As an outcome, Harry, resenting an insult to Traylor, fights a duel with Davis, in which both are wounded.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Lincoln meets Mary Todd and after a strange courtship wins her. Harry Needles, following a period of recuperation, returns to Chicago thoroughly restored to health.

"Let's go over and pay our respects to her," Speed suggested. They went, Lincoln being carefully dressed in his first suit of black clothes. Miss Todd was a bright, vivacious girl of middle stature, twenty-two years old. She was fashionably dressed and carried her head proudly—a smart-looking, witty, well spoken girl, but not especially handsome. Honest Abe was deeply impressed by her talk and fine manners and general comeliness. He felt her grace and charm and spoke of it with enthusiasm. But to him and to her there seemed to be an impassable gulf between them. She changed her mind about that, however, when she heard him speak and felt the power of his personality and saw his face lighted by the candle of his spirit. It was a handsome face in those moments of high elation. Hardship and malarial poison had lined and sallowed his skin. The shadows of loneliness and sorrow were in its sculpturing. But when his eyes glowed with passion one saw not the rough mask which the life of the pioneer had given him. His form lost its awkwardness; his face took on a noble and impressive beauty. To quote his own words to the boy, Josiah Traylor, his character was speaking as well as his lips. Mary had the insight to recognize his power. She felt the strength of his spirit. She agreed with her friends that here was a man of great promise. She felt the need of him.

To one who loved beauty and respected women as he did, the grace and refinement of this young lady had a singular appeal, coupled, as it was, with the urge of his strong, masculine nature. It was a revelation. He was like a young poet going out into the open and seeing for the first time the mysterious beauty of the mountains or "the exquisite, delicate, thin curve of the new moon in spring." He began to seek and study refinement of thought, of manner, of dress, of expression. He knew that he needed Mary, but had the feeling that she was not for him.

A woman who lived near the Edwards' house had a small, hairy poodle dog. One day, as Abe and Mary were walking along the street, they met this woman, who asked if they had seen her dog.

"I wouldn't wonder if some one down the street had got him tied to the end of a pole and is using him to swab off his windows," said Abe Lincoln with a good-natured laugh. "I'll try to find him for you."

Mary enjoyed fun and this and like sallies of the young legislator added a certain zest to their friendship. Women are like children in their love of humor.

The diminutive Douglas saw in Miss Todd an asset of much value and his attentions began to be assiduous. Mary was indifferent to his lofty manner and sonorous vocalism. Abe Lincoln liked her better for that.

She encouraged the visits of the latter and invited his confidence. The fact filled him with a great joy. They went about together. In the Edwards parlor he modestly told her of his work and his life plan. She differed with him on certain subjects which were unfortunately fundamental. He did not love her as he had loved Ann. But her personality pleased and fascinated the young legislator. One evening under the spell of it he asked her to be his wife. She consented. Then he began to think it over.

It was like Lincoln in his relations with women to get the cart before the horse, so to speak. The points upon which they disagreed came up for consideration. She could not think as he did on the subject of slavery and the kindred one of state rights. His manners were not like hers. They grew naturally out of one's history and character. He could be kind and gentle in his way. But, mainly, his manners would have to be like the rugged limbs of the oak. The grace and elegance of the water-willow and the white birch were not for him. It saddened him to conclude that he would have to be for a long time just what he was —crude, awkward, unlearned in the graces and amenities of cultivated people. He rightly judged that his crudeness would be a constant source of irritation to the proud Mary. As their acquaintance progressed the truth of his conviction grew more apparent. This, however, did not so much concern him as her lack of sympathy with some of his deepest motives. He decided that, after all, he did not love her and that to marry her would be committing a great wrong.

Some of the unhappiest days of his life followed. His conscience gave him no rest. He knew not what to do. He wrote a letter to Miss Todd in which he reviewed the history of his thinking on the subject of their marriage and frankly but tenderly stated his conviction that it would imperil her happiness to marry him. Before sending it he submitted the letter to his friend Speed.

The latter read it over and looked very grave.

"What do you think of it?" Lincoln asked.

"I would never send a letter like that to a lady," Speed answered. "If you feel as you say, go and tell her so, but don't put it in a letter."

Lincoln went to see her that evening and returned to his friend in a more cheerful mood.

"Did you tell her?" Speed asked.

"Yes, I told her."

"What happened?"

"She burst out crying and I threw my arms around her and kissed her and that settled it. We are going to be married."

What an illustration of the humanity and chivalry of Honest Abe was in the proceeding!

"I'm sure you'll get along all right together," said Speed. "Your spirit is jealous of any one likely to get in its way. But she won't. She'll fall in line and do what she can to help you."

Now, a little before this time, Henry Brimstead and other creditors of Davis had gone to Chicago in the matter of the satisfaction of their judgment against him. Henry had driven a wagon across the prairies and, returning, had brought Bim and her mother to his home and then to Springfield. It was while they were there that Harry had come down to Chicago out of the woods in a condition of health which had alarmed his physician. The latter had put him on a steamboat and sent him East. He was bound for the mountain country in northern New York.

Bim and her mother returned to Chicago on the stage, the former to take a place in the store as the representative of Samson's interest.

Harry was three years in the wilderness trying to regain his health. Success came to him in the last year of his banishment.

Toward the end of it he received a letter from Mr. Lincoln. It was written soon after that curious climax in the courting of Mary Todd. In this letter he said:

"I am serving my last term in the legislature. I learn that you are in better health and I hope that you will have the strength and inclination to return soon and be a candidate for my seat in the house. Samson will not do it, being so busy with large affairs. You are young. You have won distinction in the service of your country. You have studied the problems of the county and the state. Samson and Baker and Logan and Browning agree with me that you are the man for the place.

"As for myself, I am going to be married in a year or so. I shall have to give all my time to the practice of the law. I am now in partnership with Stephen T. Logan and am slowly clearing my conscience of debt. I have done what I could for the state and for Sangamon county. It hasn't been much. I want you to take up the burden, if you can, until I get free of my debts, at least. By and by I may jump into the ring again."

Harry was glad to obey the summons. Soon after the arrival of Mr. Lincoln's letter his doctor gave the young man what he called "an honorable discharge." The magic of youth and its courage and of good air had wrought a change of which the able doctor had had little hope in the beginning.

In his travels through the great forest Harry had met David Parish and Stephen Van Renssalaer, at whose homes on the shore of the St. Lawrence he had spent many a happy summer day. Three years had passed since that fateful morning on the prairie. Through the winters he had lived in a comfortable hunter's camp on the shore of Lake Placid. Summers he had wandered with a guide and canoe through the lakes and rivers of the wilderness hunting and fishing and reading the law books which he had borrowed from Judge Fine of Ogdensburg. Each summer he worked down the Oswegatchie to that point for a visit with his new friends. The history of every week had been written to Bim and her letters had reached him at the points where he was wont to rest in his travels. The lovers had not lost their ardor. Theirs was the love "that hopes and endures and is patient."

On a day in June, 1841, he boarded a steamboat at Ogdensburg on his way to Chicago. He arrived in the evening and found Samson at the home of Bim and her mother—a capacious and well-furnished house on Dearborn street. Bim was then a little over twenty-five years old. A letter from John Wentworth says that she was "an exquisite bit of womanhood learned in the fine arts of speech and dress and manner."

The store had doubled in size under her management and with the help of the capital of Samson and Sarah Traylor. The epidemic had seized her toward the last of her nursing and left the marks of its scourge upon her. It had marred her beauty, but Samson writes, "the girl was still very handsome. She was kind of scared to meet Harry for fear of what he'd think of those little marks on her face, but I told her not to worry."

"You are the smartest and loveliest looking creature that I ever saw in my life," said Harry after he had held her in his arms a moment.

"But see what happened to me—look at my face," she answered.

"It is more beautiful than ever," he said. "Those marks have doubled my love for you. They are medals of honor better than this one that I wear. I want to marry you as soon as possible. I've been looking forward to that since I was sixteen."

"Then I think I'll take you and marry you before you have a chance to fight another duel."

"I don't hear anything but love and marriage," said Samson. "We've been rassling down at our house to keep Josiah from running off and getting married. He's engaged already."

"Engaged! To whom?" Harry asked.

"To Annabel Brimstead. She's a little older than he is. She laughed at him and promised to marry him as soon as he was nominated for President by all his friends. She would now vote for him herself. He has become a good athlete and the best scholar in school. He has every boy and girl in the village working for him evenings and Saturdays."

"What are they doing?" Harry asked.

"Making those newfangled things they call lucifers. You can build a fire in a second with 'em. They cut splinters out of soft wood, dip their ends in brimstone—which Joe learned how to make—and put them in a hot oven until the brimstone is baked. Then a scratch will bring a flame. Joe puts them up in bundles and sells them to the merchants and calls them lucifer matches. He has invented a machine that will cut and dip a thousand splinters an hour. I tell you, Annabel is in danger."

He took a lucifer out of his pocket and scratched it on the bottom of his boot. The party looked with wonder at its flame which quickly consumed the slender thread of pine in his fingers.

"I have always thought that Joe would make a whale of a man," said Harry.

"We all seem to be threatened with immediate and overwhelming happiness," Bim exclaimed.

"The only thing in the way of mine is the national debt that I have accumulated," Harry remarked.

"I knew he'd think of something," said Bim ruefully. "If I wanted to abolish the noble institution of marriage I'd make him chairman of the ways and means committee."

"Harry, your credit is still good with me, and I'm prosperous," Samson began. "I want you to know that Bim's energy and skill are mostly responsible for my success. I guess we owe more to your sickness than you're aware of. If it hadn't been for that we would be plodding along at the same old pace. We would not have felt the need of speeding up. It was your misfortune that brought Bim into the store. If she wants to retire and marry you, I rather think she is entitled to do it. I don't want any more fooling around about this matter. Sarah and I couldn't stand it. She's kept me awake nights talking about it. The thing has worried us plenty. We rebel and demand action before anything else happens. We feel as if we had some rights in this case."

"I concede them and second your demand," Harry answered. "Bim must name a near day. I only need a week to get some clothes and go up to Milwaukee on a little matter of business."

"I don't know whether we'll give him a week or not," said Bim playfully. "A great many things may happen to him in a week."

CHAPTER XXIV.

Which Describes a Pleasant Holiday and a Pretty Stratagem.

Two days later Bim suggested that they should take a day's ride in the open and spend the night at the home of a friend of hers in a settlement known as Plain's End, Harry having expressed a wish to get out on the prairies in the saddle after his long term of travel on a steamboat.

"Are you sure that you can stand an all day's journey?" Bim asked.

"I! I could kill a bear with my hands and carry him home on my back and eat him for dinner," the young man boasted.

"I've got enough of the wild West in me to like a man who can eat bears, if there's nothing better," said Bim. "I didn't know but you'd been spoiled in the home of those eastern millionaires. If you're willing to take what comes and make the best of it, I'll give you a day that you will remember. You will have to put up with a very simple hospitality, but I wouldn't wonder if you'd enjoy it."

"We will leave here day after tomorrow. Our horses will be at the door at eight o'clock in the morning. We shall take some luncheon and reach our destination late in the afternoon and return next day. It will give us a good long visit with each other and you'll know me better before we get back."

"I want to know you as well as I love you," he said. "I suppose it will be like studying law—one never gets through with it."

"I've found myself a rather abstruse subject—as bad as Coke, of which Abe used to talk so much with my father," she declared. "I shall be glad if it doesn't discourage you."

"The mystery of woman can not be solved by intellectual processes," the young man remarked. "Observation is the only help and mine has been mostly telescopic. We have managed to keep ourselves separated by a great distance even when we were near each other. It has been like looking at a star with a very limited parallax. It's a joy to be able to see you with the naked eye."

"You will have little to look at on this holiday but me and the prairies," said Bim.

"I think the prairies will be neglected. I shall wear my cavalry uniform and try to get a pair of the best horses in Chicago for the trip."

"Then you would have to get mine. I have a handsome pair of black young horses from Ohio—real high steppers. It is to be my party. You will have to take what comes and make the best of it."

The day of their journey arrived—a warm, bright, cloudless day in September, 1841. The long story of those years of separation was told as they rode along. Biggs had been killed in a drunken brawl at Alton. Davis had gone to the far West—a thoroughly discredited man. Henry Brimstead had got his new plow on the market and was prospering beyond all his hopes. Eli had become a merchant of unusual ability and vision. His square dealing and good sense had done much to break down prejudice against the Jews in the democracy of the West. Samson Traylor was getting wealth and a reputation for good sense. He had made the plan on which the business had developed. He had proved himself a wise and far seeing man. Sarah's friends had been out in Springfield for a visit. They had invested money in the business. Her brother had decided to bring his family West and settle in Sangamon county.

The Long Story Was Told as They Rode Along.

Agents of the store were traveling in Wisconsin, Illinois and Indiana selling its goods to country dealers. They carried with them the progressive and enlightened spirit of the city and the news. Everywhere they insisted upon a high standard of honesty in business. A man who had no respect for his contract was struck off the list. They spread the every-day religion of the counting room. They were a welcome unifying and civilizing force in the middle country.

* * * * * *

The lovers stopped in a grove at noon and fed their horses and Harry built a fire and made a broach of green sticks on which he broiled beef steak.

A letter from Harry to Sarah Traylor tells of the beauty of the day.

"It was my great day of fulfillment all the dearer because I had come back to health and youth and beloved scenes out of those years shadowed with loneliness and despair," he writes. "The best part of it, I assure you, was the face I loved and that musical voice ringing like a bell in merry laughter and in the songs which had stirred my heart in the days of its tender youth. You—the dear and gentle mother of my later boyhood—are entitled to know of my happiness when I heard that voice tell me in its sweeter tone of the love which has endured through all these years of stern trial. We talked of our plans as we sat among the ferns and mosses in the cool shade sweetened by the incense of burning fagots, over that repast to which we shall be returning often for refreshment in poorer days. We had thought of you and of the man so well beloved of you and us in all these plans. We shall live in Springfield so that we may be near you and him and our friend, Honest Abe."

It is a long letter presenting minute details in the history of that sentimental journey and allusion to matters which have no part in this record. Its substance being fully in the consciousness of the writer, he tenderly folds it up and returns it to the package—yellow and brittle and faded and having that curious fragrance of papers that have lain for so[illegible] in the gloom and silence of a locked mahogany drawer. So alive are these letters with the passion of youth in long forgotten years that the writer ties the old ribbon and returns them to their tomb with a feeling of sadness, finding a singular pathos in the contrast of their look and their contents. They are turning to dust, but the soul of them has gone into this little history.

The young man and woman mounted their horses and resumed their journey. It was after two o'clock. The Grand Prairie lay ahead of them. The settlement of Plain's End was twenty-one miles away on its farther side. They could just see its tall oak trees in the dim distance.

"We must hurry, if we get there before dark," said the girl. "Above all, we must be careful to keep our direction. Its' easy to get lost down in the great prairie."

They heard a cat-bird singing in a near thicket as they left their camp. It reminded Bim of her favorite ballad and she sang it with the spirit of old:

"My sweetheart, come along—
Don't you hear the glad song
As the notes of the nightingale flow?
Don't you hear the fond tale of the sweet nightingale
As she sings in the valleys below?
As she sings in the valleys below?"

They went on, shoulder-deep in the tall grass on the lower stretches of the prairie. Here and there it gave Harry the impression that he was swimming his horse in "noisy, vivid green water." They startled a herd of deer and a number of wild horses. When they lost sight of the woods at Plain's End the young man, with his cavalry training, was able to ride standing on his saddle until he had it located.

It reminded him of riding in the Everglades and he told of his adventures there as they went on, but very modestly. He said not a word of his heroic fight the day that he and sixty of his comrades were cut off and surrounded in the "land of the grassy waters." But Bim had heard the story from other lips.

Late in the afternoon the woods loomed in front of them, scarcely a mile off. Near the end of the prairie they came to a road which led them past the door of a lonely cabin. It seemed to be deserted, but its windows were clean and a faint column of smoke rose from its chimney. There were hollyhocks and sunflowers in its small and cleanly dooryard. A morning-glory vine had been trained around the windows.

"Broad creek is just beyond," said Bim. "I don't know how the crossing will be."

They came presently to the creek, unexpectedly swollen. A man stood on the farther shore with some seventy feet of deep and rapid water between him and the travelers.

"That man looks like Stephen Nuckles," said Harry.

"It is Stephen Nuckles," Bim answered.

"Howdy, Steve!" the young soldier called.

"Howdy, boy!" said the old minister. "That ar creek is b'ilin' over. I reckon you'll have to swim the hosses."

They tried, but Bim's horse refused to go beyond good footing.

"You kin light at that ar house an' spend the night, but the folks have gone erway," the minister called.

"I guess you'll have to marry us right here and now," Harry proposed. "Night is coming and that house is our only refuge."

"Poor boy! There seems to be no escape for you!" Bim exclaimed with a sigh. "Do you really and honestly want to marry me? If there's any doubt about it I'll leave the horses with you and swim the creek. You could put them in the barn and swim with me or spend the night in the cabin."

"It's a cool evening and the creek is very wet," he answered. "I'm going to take this matter in my own hands."

He called to the minister. "Steve, this is the luckiest moment of my life and you are just the man of all others I would have chosen for its most important job. Can you stand right where you are and marry us?"

"You bet, I kin, suh," the minister answered. "I've often said I could marry any one half a mile erway if they would only talk as loud as I kin. I've got the good book right here in my pocket, suh. My ol' woman is comin'. She'll be hyah in a minute fer to witness the perceedin's."

Mrs. Nuckles made her appearance on the river bank in a short time.

Then the minister shouted: "We'll begin by readin' the nineteenth chapter of Matthew."

He shouted the chapter and the usual queries, knelt and prayed and pronounced them man and wife.

The young man and woman walked to the cabin and put their horses in its barn, where they found an abundance of hay and oats. They rapped at the cabin door, but got no response. They lifted its latch and entered.

A table stood in the middle of the room, set for two. On its cover of spotless white linen were plates and cups and saucers and a big platter of roasted prairie chickens and a great frosted cake and preserves and jellies and potato salad and a pie and a bottle of currant wine. A clock was ticking on the shelf. There were live embers in the fireplace and wood in the box, and venison hanging in the chimney.

The rural district cast 31 for and 69 against. The law requires a majority vote in both precincts. As the school house was burned several months ago, it will be necessary to provide temporary quarters for the pupils.

The sawed off shotguns for use of the twenty-seven deputy marshals recently appointed by the board of supervisors were received last week by Shupe Bros. hardware. They are new Winchester repeating guns with a short barrel. Each magazine will hold six shells, which are to be filled with 00 buckshot, nine to the load. A bank robber who comes in range of one of these weapons will stand little show of escape.

Mrs. Weeks Seeks Divorce

Because of alleged cruelty and abuse, family desertion, non-support and the commission of other offenses Julia Weeks has petitioned the court to grant her a divorce from Anfin O. Weeks. She was deeply humiliated and subsequently compelled to flee from her home at Gregory, S. D. The separation occurred about July 15, 1920, and the present location of defendant is unknown to the plaintiff. The defendant was deeply in debt for groceries and other family expenses and abandoned plaintiff without leaving her any money. She disposed of her exempt household goods and applied the proceeds on the family debts, later she borrowed money of her sister to return to Wight county. The couple were married at Webster City and for several years resided at Holmes, where defendant was adjudged a bankrupt in 1916, his indebtedness being nearly $25,000. He conducted a general store and was postmaster. The wife further alleges that because of this trouble and others he fled from Wright county about October 6, 1916.

HOW TO FOCUS YOUR LENS

In seeking to comply with the new Iowa law against glaring headlights many motorists overlook the fact that proper focus is as necessary as a special len.

Focus is determined by the lamp bulb and the reflector, not by lens. Here is how you get it, according to the Des Moines Register:

Place your car, at night, twenty-five feet or more from a blank wall, or side of a building. Direct the light of your headlights against the wall. Turn out all lights except one headlight.

Open lamp door. Move the bulb forward or backward, watching the circle of light thrown on the wall. When you find the point where this circle is as small as it will get, your lamp is at "No. 1" focus.. Turn out this lamp, and focus your other headlight.

Then, to make your headlights legal, all you have to do is equip them with lens made for the "No. 1" focus and approved by the Iowa State high[illegible] commissioner. (All garages and [illegible]dealers have the list of [illegible]) This "No. 1" focus [illegible] illuminating engineers as best for all lamps and all road conditions.

There are two other possible focuses—"No. 2" and "No. 3." These are not practicable for the average motorist because they cannot be accurately obtained except by an illuminating engineer.

Among the lenses tested and approved by the Iowa State highway commission, some require the normal "No. 1" focus and others the "No. 2" and "No. 3."

Certain of these approved lenses are not lawful unless the lamps are tilted to a certain angle to throw the light downward.

For the average driver who wants to adjust his own readlights with a minimum of time and trouble, lenses that take the "No. 1" focus and no tilt will prove most practicable.

The entertainment given at the Congregational church was of more than usual interest, and was very good. The two entertainers were full blood Sioux Indians, and gave the songs and melodies of their people in a most pleasing and entertaining manner. One of the men was a graduate of Hampton Institute, and the other is a Senior at Oberlin. The former was very enthusiastic regarding the Belmond band, stating that it was a splendidly trained organization and one which the town should be proud of. He is the leader of the band at Hampton Institute. The latter entertainer is a member of the Glee Club at Oberlin, and the two were exceptionally fine singers and entertainers. A good-sized audience was present at the entertainment on Saturday evening.

Getting Together

One of the biggest problems facing farmers and bankers today is that of providing ample farm credits on reasonable terms. They can solve it only by working together, says

The COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

Our credit system is based on a 60-day paper intended to serve commercial interests with a quick turn-over. It doesn't serve the farmer, whose turn-over comes once a year. How can he be supplied with the capital he needs to run his farm business?

Because the problem of furnishing the farmer with ample credit facilities is one of such vital interest to the whole farm industry and to our national welfare, THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN has many trained investigators working on the plans offered for solving the difficulties. Their articles will keep you informed on developments toward easier farm credits. For an example, next week's issue carries a story by E. V. Wilcox on financing the marketing of a major farm crop. Other competent articles are coming soon.

To make sure of getting them all, you'd better send me $1.00 today for the next 52 big issues of this dominant weekly.

FACTS ONLY — TRUTH ALWAYS

...A MESSAGE...

This is the first of a series of ads we intend to run in this paper.

We are first of all a one price store. The price marked on the goods is always the selling price.

Second, we want you to believe implicitly every statement made in every ad. If the people of this country lose faith in the business of retailing, it will be because they are being educated NEVER to pay the full price of the merchandise they buy.

Pick up a paper of Mason City or any other city, scan the advertisements and see how few things are advertised for which the full price is asked. Mostly all the merchandise offered, you will note, is sold for less than it is worth. If every advertisement TOLD the truth, it must follow that many merchants would soon be bankrupts, for no store can continually sell goods for less than worth.

To speak the truth of the store and its merchandise, is the simple rule of Manley's advertisements. Manley's storekeeping ideals and practices do not permit anything to be printed or spoken, either ignorantlye.

Manley's advertisements are intended to give information about merchandise helpful to customers in making their selection.

It is not a lever to sell goods—it is a lever to buy with.

Every statement is accurate, absolutely reliable, responsible only to the GOOD NAME and HONOR which we have fairly earned by our standard of FAIR DEALING.

It Was The Real Stuff; But Oh The Awful Price

Hampton Men Think They Are Getting Gallons Of It But Only Get Stung

A HIGH PRICE FOR WATER

Chronicle: Talk about money from the babies! It is nothing compared to what was done to a few Hampton citizens one night last week by a smooth guy who dropped into town a few days previously and took orders for some of the real stuff in five gallon lots at $20 per gallon. It is said that he took in $500 and instead of delivering five gallons to each of the patrons he delivered about two quarts—the balance in the can was pure water. You see there was a "container, within a container."

The aforesaid crook arrived in town, hired one of our citizens for a $20 bill to introduce him to a few "prospects" who liked to have some of the real stuff around—for medical purposes. He succeeded in securing orders from five parties, and the delivery was to be made in a corn field, a few miles north of Hampton.

The crook had a regular government tester, but it only touched the hole in the small container. It tasted like the pure stuff to the five patrons. It was the real stuff. The money changed hands, about $500, and the aforesaid crook drove gallantly away, with head up. The five patrons returned to Hampton with the precious cans quietly tucked away out of sight. After getting home a further investigation was made by one of the local parties. He does not get stung very often, but this was his time. Five gallons at $100 and only two quarts of the real stuff. The crook ought to have been arrested for obtaining money under false pretenses.

MUST OPEN CARTONS AND STAMP PACKAGES

A business man of the city, who has a permit to sell cigarettes, has recently made inquiry regarding the placing of revenue stamps on every package of cigarettes sold, regardless of whether they are in carton or in package. A letter from the Treasurer of State reads as follows:

"Permit holders selling cigarettes in carton lot should open the carton and place the required amount of revenue upon each package of cigarettes contained therein. Stamps must not be placed upon the outside of a carton."

A FINE STORY—BUT ABSOLUTELY UNTRUE

The Wright County Monitor said yesterday:

Witnesses from Clarion who attended the Kanawha-Belmond ball game at the latter place on Sunday report a disgraceful row in the sixth inning. A Belmonder became miffed at one of the decisions and picking up a ball bat started into the diamond to beat up the umpire. A free for all fight followed in which several heads were cracked and a number of noses badly disfigured. This same fellow has caused more or less trouble at the other games but for some reason he was not arrested. The beter citizens of Belmond are quite indignant over the whole affair.

Aside from the fact that the row didn't take place in the sixth inning, that it was a Kanawhaite instead of a Belmonder who picked up the bat and started for the umpire, that there were no heads cracked and no noses disfigured, that no such fellow has caused more or less trouble at the games, and there has been no occasion for arrest, the Monitor's story is a good one. Whoever informed Brother Harwood has Munchausen in the piker class.

OBITUARY

Stamford Trees Sarber, second son of Spurgeon and Jessie Sarber, was born June seventeenth, 1920, near Belmond, Iowa, and died after an illness of three weeks, August 22, 1921, at the age of one year, two months and five days.

He was a very affectionate child and dearly loved by all who knew him, and he will be missed very much by his father and mother and brother DeWitt and by four grandparents and many other relatives and friends. Funeral services, in charge of Rev. J. H. Edge, were held from the Pink Trees home Thursday of last week and interment made in Franklin Grove cemetery.

SHOWER

An item that was unavoidably left out last week was that of a shower given to Edith Treese at the home of Mrs. Howard Forristal on Saturday evening. About 35 guests were present and the bride-to-be was presented with a variety of useful and appropriate gifts. Refreshments were served and the evening spent in an enjoyable social time.

STRANGER PROTESTS AT TREATMENT RECEIVED

I am a stranger within your little city and while here I want to enter a protest to the good citizens of the town and call the atention of the council to a grevious error that is being made.

I arrived in your town Friday and parked my car in front of a drug store, in much the same manner as I noted other cars were parked. Its true that my car was the "outer" one, and nearest to the corner. I had business of small importance and my car stood there perhaps twenty minutes. When I was in the car ready to leave, I was approached by the city marshall, and invited to accompany him to the man who rakes in the sheckles from strangers.

In the office over a clothing store an old gentleman with a Vandyke beard assessed me $3.70 for "parking my car in front of a drinking fountain." I asked him if he was not ashamed to "do it" and he would not say "no." He said he was only doing what the city council had told him to do, when strangers, who have no way of knowing that they are violating some part of an ordinance that not half of the people in the town know about. Now I am not protesting about the measley little $3.70. The town council doubtless does not pay the marshall enough and the old genleman with the Vandyke "needs the money," too, perhaps, but I do want the good people of your town and your council to realize how much an injustice to strangers is being pulled off daily.

In my town, Minneapolis, when you go there you are given a round plate button that says "Visitors." That means that police protection is assured you while you are in the city; it means that every police officer is under obligations to "set you right" should he see you in error in driving or parking your car. It is an assurance that gives you confidence.

Your city marshall is not to blame; neither is the court officials; but the fault lies in the law making body. What is there, pray tell to indicate to anyone where to park and where not to park? What is there to indicate to me any particular ordinance or any rules? No signs are in evidence and no mark on the paving to prevent persons from becoming "law violaters." If your city council wants certain rules enforced, then strangers at least, should be first informed and if they presist in violating your "rules." then it is time enough to impose the fines.

Let me suggest to the council, that that august body place signs "No Parking", or at least paint a "white line" from the curb into the street to indicate that cars shall be parked "thus far and no farther." I thank you for the "nice, welcome reception" and when again shall I have occasion to "pass" through Forest City, I shall do so with the emphasis on the "pass through." Respectfully. A STRANGER.—Forest City Summit.

Kanawha Men Who Started The Fight At Ball Game To Pay The Penalty

DISGRACEFUL RIOT STAGED

Kanawha Fans Seeing Team Losing, Start Fight With Baseball Bats

John Cosgriff, George Cosgriff and B. J. "Curley" Lewis of Kanawha were arrested and fined yesterday for instigating the riot at the ball game here Sunday.

They plead guilty to the charges preferred, admitted they lost their heads, and said they were very, very sorry. Mayor Barry then assessed them as follows:

John Cosgriffff, $35 and costs.

George Cosgriff and Lewis each $25 and costs. The gentlemen said they considered the fines pretty high, and were informed that the next time they lost their heads it would be still higher. John Cosgriff was the man with the bat, who started all the fracas. The three had gone to the fair at Britt and were brought to Belmond last night for trial. Cosgriff stated that he just wanted to make an adjustment with the umpire.

They all promised that henceforth they would be good, and that it would never occur again.

The men admitted that they started the whole proceedings, that they alone were to blame, and that noone else had anything to do with them grabbing the bat and starting the fuss.

At the game Sunday, the three men became angry over a decision on base, and started out into the diamohd to "adjust" the matter. The umpire ordered them back, and they refused. Marshal Hal Nourse then ordered them back and they jumped into him, precipitating a general riot in which several knock-downs occured but nobody was hurt.

There are rumors that there are to be othen "adjustments" also.

The ball team has disbanded and reorganized with John Jones as the captain and Geo. Corcoran as manager. They play Kanawha Sunday at the lake, Dows Monday, and in the tournament at Garner the next three days.

SERIOUS AUTO ACCIDENT REPORTED AT GOODELL

An auto accident of rather serious consequences was reported at Goodell yesterday morning, when Mrs. White and daughter were thrown off a grade and the daughter seriously injured. A physician was summoned at once from Hampton and is now in attendance. If the young lady does not improve it is understood that she was to be taken to the hospital at Hampton last evening. The report did not state how the accident occured.

FREE AIR!

Did you like last week's spiel? Well here's another: how's this one? We think it's pretty good—there's su[illegible] a lot of truth in it.

Free Air on the Streets of Belmond

Didja ever just stand on a corner or the curb of the street on Saturday night and just listen to folks? Well, I did, and I must say it's funny the way folks talk and act. The first we heard came like this:

"Well, Jawn, howza old kid? Gotcher plowin' done yet? Yep, sure is tuff but then oh heck, what's the usea worryin'. Yep, got done Thursday night. Howdaja comeout onyeroats? Pretty good; got 1900 bushels offa seventy acres. But whatsa usea raisinem when ya don't get nothin' for 'em? That's what I say, but then they say better times 're comin'. Say let's goin an geta lemmon coak [illegible] a Green River, whatcha say? Awri', les go."

Then pretty soon we heard:

"Gee kid, he's some guy—and Some Car too—O gee—we went ta Thornton th' other night an' we passed ever'-thing on the road! Say, why don'tcha go? Some dance, we danced for about four hours and some jolly crowd [illegible] I'm tellin' ya, kid. Comin' home we had a pu'chure but we didn't care, we hada 'ota fun outa it. Yeh, we got home about four minutes after three and gee but ma raved next morning 'cause I was so tired an' wore out, but it'sa lota fun an' a great life. The other party just said unhunh an' I'll bet and oh gee.

And hen—

"Say, I thought she was kiddin' me when she said that hat was $12.00. W'y, I c'n get the ver' same thing in the National f'r $6.25. Belive me I won't pay it with oats two nickels a bushel. Nothin' doin'."

A couple of girls came along:

"Oh boy, ain't that band leader just simply swell! Wonder if he's married or not? I don't care if he is he's some boy—don't he look swell [illegible] there tho? Pretty good band for town, but say, they hada fine band at the Fort Dodge fair, the real stuff. A feller had a horn that wound all 'round his neck and tooted right straight up! I was sittin' in the gran'-stand talkin' about him and he looked right at me an' winked! Gee! I know my face went rainbow, but I kinda smiled and he did too an' then after that ever' time they played he'd look right at me and smile. Wish pa an' ma hadn't been there."

Along came two boys:

"Darn that guy! How'he know I ain't 21? Funny a fella can't buy a cigarette in this man's town. I was in Clarion and got 'em two diff'rent places and they didn't say nothin'. When yuh wanta buy a pill here they look atcha like yuh had the small pox r sometin'. I know where I c'n getem and I'm agoin' ta. I ain't afraid to smoke 'em on the street. I smoked one right before Matt an' he never saw me!"

The band played a waltz. A couple came along, girl over-painted, hair over-done, skirts to the knees, the boy wearing a yellow tie, green socks, and holding onto the girl's arm. Said the girl:

"Gee, don't that give you the wiggles?"

Came along two old men:

"We-ll, I heard that ol' man —— had a purty good sup'ly laid up fer winter an' I guess th' way he wuz loaded when we thrashed he had the supply pretty well broken into that day. When his wife asked how many there'd be fer dinner he said 35, an' there wuz only 13 of us in the hull bunch. Haw, haw! Say, les geta a disha iscream."

Two young fellows came along singing "She's a ja-a-a-z-z-z ba-a-aby, an' she' some kid, to-o-o.' To two young girls: "Say, kids, doncha wana ride? Yeah, got th' car right aroun' the corner. C'mon, les go." "Are you kiddin us or do ya really wana take us?" "Honest, kid, no kiddin". C'mon, takea spin. We'll give ya a swell li'l' ride." And they went.

"Did you ear about her? Why, I was so shocked! Mrs. —— told me the truth about it from start to finish and I never dreamed—why it was just awful—and I thought—I'll tell you, but you mustn't tell a soul, because she told me not to tell, and of course—well it seems—"

BIG DOUBLE CIRCUS HAS VAST PROGRAM

Ringling Bros. and Barnmum & Bailey To Present Scores of Entirely New Features

The announcement that the far-famed Ringling Brothers and Barnum & Bailey Combined Shows are to exhibit at Mason City Thursday, Sept. 8 has aroused no end of interest. It would seem as though practically all the youngsters and grown-ups in this section were planning to attend.

Twice each day for almost two months New York's great Madison Square Garden was packed with those who thronged to see this biggest program in the circus history. They saw scores of the jungle's most ferocious beasts subjugated to such a degree, that these beautiful animals leaped to and rode on the backs of elephants and horses jumped through hoops of fire, opened their mouths that their men and women trainers might lay their heads and hands inside them, or leaped from pedestal to pedestal like trained dogs And these marvelous dumb actors are are all on tour with the great double circus. The four immense steel arenas in which they preform are set up in the mammoth main tent. There is no additional charge—everthing is on the one program. And by "everything" is meant not only the wild animal displays, but the entire circus. More 600 men and women, embracing the world's foremost arenic stars, take part. There are almost 100 clowns. Aside from the ferocious beasts, the program includes thirty trained elephants. Troupes of camels perform in the rings. Five troupes of monkeys. pigs and pigeons. Fully seventy trained horses and Shetlands are presented. It is the biggest circus program the world has ever seen, given under the largest tent and, in conection, is the famous combined Ringling Brothers and Barnum & Bailey menagerie.

The Key that Unlocks the Door to Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

CUT THEM OFF THE LIST

The disgraceful riot staged by the fans from Kanawha at the game here Sunday should be the last opportunity given them to stir up a rumpus. They should be cut off absolutely from the list of teams with whom Belmond will play.

The utterly disgraceful exhibition of their sportsmanship on the grounds here Sunday shold bar them from anoter game this year on the Belmond diamond. With the flimsiest of excuses they started a riot which was only saved from being serious in its consequences by the prompt and efficent work of the local police force, who were in the midst of the battle in short order and finally succeeded in subduing the rioters. It was due to the foresight of the city authorities that all of the police force and extra help besides was at the game. The Kanawha Reporter may think that one cop is enough, but Sunday ought to be sufficient evidence that a corporal's guard is almost too small to take care of some people.

It has been just this way at every game the two teams have played this summer, with an undercurrent of antagonism held more or less under control until Sunday. Belmond was not to blame, they have endeavored to avoid every appearance of a fight, but Sunday the ignorant and perhaps half-drunk fans from the west who started the fracas went too far and the fight was on. Two Kanawha men, disputing a decision of the umpire, ran out into the diamond with the evident intent to do something. The umpire ordered them back, and they refused. Marshal Hal Nourse came running up and one of the Kanawha men pitched into him. Another man grabbed a bat and came arunning, the rest of the cops mixed in, the crowd poured out from both sides, and billy clubs, base ball bats and fists were flying thru the air. All because the Kanawha fans were too hot headed and tempered to reason.

They were egged on; Kanawha men who should know more, who ought to have had sense enough to know that a match touched to the powder was dangerous, were heard to urge them on. What kind of work is that, anyway? If the two teams cannot play without the fans fighting, then don't play. There is no bitter feeling between the two teams, they have contested on friendly terms all summer, but the Kanawha fans have placed the matter to a point where future games between the two teams should cease.

There is no need of further disturbance, just cut Kanawha off the list and let them travel their own sweet way. Belmond does not have trouble with other teams, only with Kanawha, and the best thing to do is to ostracise them. Let them play in their own back yard, but not in ours. Otherwise baseball in Belmond won't drawn even a corporal's guard.

It is to be regretted, for Belmond, fans or players, were entirely innocent of starting the unfortunate occurance Sunday. They had nothing to do with starting it, and left it to the proper authorities to stop, and the team or fans should not be blamed in any way for originating the near-riot. There is no excuse for those men who did start it, and they should be made to settle for it. All Kanawha fans who accompany their team are not beligerant and hot-tempered, and the whole town should not be judged by the few, but so long as the said few makes things unpleasant, then the best thing to do is to quit playing with them. When these fans saw their team being whipped, they simply could not stard it, and waded in. All right, don't give them another chance. It's a poor sport who can't take a licking.

AS THE EDITOR SEES IT.

Hampton Recorder: While at peace the wise man devises ways and means of perpetuating peace. Early in November the wise ones of many nations of the earth will gather in Washington. They will talk peace in an effort to pevent further wars. Disarmament will be their principal theme.

Japan, it is stated, will send two hundred of her ablest statesmen and international experts. Apparently Japan does not propose to allow anything to be "put over" on her, if numbers and brains can prevent. The Japanese delegates will be suave and polished while in Washington, but they will be in deadly earnest. Not a word of a gesture will escape them. It is with the demands of Japan that we of America are most vitally concerned.

England, France, Italy, Belgium, China and other countries will send their shrewdest and craftiest of men to safeguard their own particular interests at the meet. Every sleeve will be full of cards ready to be played at the psychological moment.

It is with men of this stamp and calibre that the secretary of state and his delegate-aids will be called upon to cope, and it is no reflection upon their mentality to state that their strategy will be taxed to the limit. We are assuming, of course, that Secretary Hughes will head the American delegation.

Undoubtedly as has been our custom in the past, the American cards will be laid upon the table, faces upward. But they will hardly be joined by the cards of other nations. That is hardly to be expected of men who have been trained in an atmosphere of secret diplomacy. The American delegates will skirmish in the open against adversaries who are concealed in a fog of doubt and uncertainty.

Then there is another influence—a sinister one—which will harass the American delegates, and may even attempt to fog the issue among the foreigners. Munition manufacturers and others who profit from warfare do not want perpetual peace. International financiers of Wall street are of this class. If the conference puts an end to warfare it also puts an end to billions and billions of fat profits that would otherwise flow into the swollen pockets of these fellows. They will do their utmost to prevent a lasting peace.

But they are not the only ones who will "butt in." The woods are full of senators and congressmen and notoriety-seeking politicians who will be button-holing delegates by the wholesale. Some will be lobbyists for the "interests," while others will see in it a means of creeping into print. The whole gang will be there with bells on.

Again, this is a "dry" country, and presumably our friends from abroad will bring their "liquid refreshments" with them. The government could hardly object to this without being discourteous. This puts another temptation in the way of our American delegates—such a temptation A parched throat gets mighty dry, and its owner will often do very queer things for "just a little nip." When a fellow is "properly mellowed" he is easy to handle, and the "mellowing" process will undoubtedly be worked to a finish by the astute gentleman from the seas.

Truly, the American footsteps will be beset with both thorns and roses, and it will require the wisdom of the ancients to successfully sidestep them.

In the meantime we will read the reams of stuff that will be heralded broadcast by the Washington correspondents and believe a fourth of what we see. Even that may be too much.

BILLY SUNDAY'S TEN COMMANDMENTS.

1. THOU SHALT NOT GOSSIP.

There are three ways to spread the news—telephone, telegraph and tell a woman. The devil is so afraid of some of you women he wouldn't get within 20 feet of you.

2. THOU SHALT NOT COVET.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's cook, nor his automobile, nor his rubber tired carriage, nor his private yacht. Many a man would like to have his neighbor's wife. You let her alone.

3. THOU SHALT NOT TANGO.

I'm against the rotten, licentious, hell-begotten dance that sends more girls to hell than anything else. I'm in favor of everything that the devil is against. And I'm against everything the devil is in favor of.

4. THOU SHALT NOT BE STINGY.

Some would-be Christians are so stingy that they would steal flies from a blind spider. There are others so mean that they sing thru their noses to save the wear and tear on their false teeth.

5. THOU SHALT NOT HAVE TOO MANY BEAUX.

It's hard to fool a real suitor, and a man doesn't want to marry a girl that's been pawed over by every young buck in the community. The frizzle-haired girl that sits up in a dark parlor until all hours of the morning with one buck after another is on the way to perdition.

6. THOU SHALT NOT BE CONCEITED.

A conceited man is like a cheapskate restaurant where everything is in the window and nothing on the table but hot air. Self-conceit will always be a millstone around your neck.

7. THOU SHALT NOT DRINK.

The man who says he can drink or leave it alone lies. No man ever intended to become a drunkard. Every drunkard started out to be simply a moderate drinker. If you believe you can leave it alone, why don't you?

8. THOU SHALT NOT CUSS.

One of the things that show the foundation of a man's character to be rotten is to hear him cuss and vomit out oaths. I would not trust a profane man any too far in any transaction.

9. THOU SHALT NOT DODGE THY DEBTS.

Some haven't religion enough to pay their debts. Would that I might have a hook and for every debt that you left unpaid I might jerk off a piece of clothing! If I did, some of you would be left with only only a celluloid collar and a pair of socks.

10. THOU SHALT NOT FLIRT.

Sciety takes no note of the flirtation on the street. It waits until the girl has lost her virtue and then slams the door in her face. I wish I could take a girl who flirts see herself as others see her. If you make eyes at a man on the street he will pay you back.

NEW BATTERY FOR CARS OUT

An all-rubber storage battery—this is the latest achievement in the developing of the electrical system on the modern motor car.

Announcement of this advance was made this week in Cleveland, by T. A. Willard, inventor and head of the battery manufacturing company which bears his name.

In this improved battery, everything is of rubber excepting the plates or grids. The wooden battery box is done away with, and replaced by a hard-rubber case. This change has made possible another important one, for with the wooden box there passes the separate rubber jar heretofore required for each battery cell.

The new case being rubber, it has been found practcable to mould it with seamless partitions, which eliminate the necessity for jars. The term "Monobloc" which has been applied describes the one-piece construction very satisfactorily.

Between the plates, threaded rubber instead of wooden separators are used. This use of rubber, however, is not entirely new, having been started six years ago under Willard patents. It is in the developement of the new case and the bringing together of rubber container and rubber separators that the latest important advance has been made.

An all-rubber battery has been the goal of the industry for years. The biggest obstacle was the apparent impossibility of making practical rubber separators. This was due to the fact that no way could be found to provide for the free passage of the battery solution between the plates without making holes in the separators so large as to cause trouble.

The use of thousands of tiny threads, which act as wicks, finally overcame this difficulty and thus paved the way for the all-rubber unit.

The moulded rubber case, besides eliminating the separate battery jar, resists decay and corrosion, in much greater degree than the wooden container, being unaffected by the acid solution or by water. Also, since rubber is a non-conductor, it markedly reduces electrical leakage, which is especially likely to be present with wooden cases in damp weather. It has a tensile strength of 3600 pounds to the square inch and must stand 18000 volt electrical test. In making this test two wireless transformers capable of sending 1000 miles are used.

In a statement given out by him regarding his most recent contribution to the developement of the storage battery, Mr. Willard said that it was the result of an effort to produce a unit that would give as nearly uninterrupted service as possible, and the various parts of which would have not only longer but also more equal life.

"My purpose has been," he continued, "to make a battery like the one-horse shay, all parts of which would live to a ripe old age and lay down their different burdens at the same time."

Say what you will about druggists offering something "just as good" because it pays a better profit, the fact still stands that ninety-nine out of a hundred druggists recommend Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy, when the best medicine for diarrhoea is asked for, and do so because they know from what their customers say of it, that it can be depended upon.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

The Klemme band returned the compliment last week and went to Garner to play with the band there at their regular concert. A week ago the Garner band went to Klemme and played with that band. Walter lives near Beebee. They have had plenty of rain in that country and the crops are looking better than here.

Chas. Schmalle presented the editor with one of the largest muskmelons it has ever been his pleasure to set teeth into. It was as large as a medium-sized watermelon and as sweet and juicy as they grow 'em. As a sample of Iowa-grown melons that was certainly a prize winner.

Pink Trees has some corn on exhibition at the Savings bank that is right up to the standard, the ears being 11 inches and three-quarters in length, the kernals all there and a lot of them. He estimates that his corn will go around 50 to 60 bushels to the acre, which is pretty good for this year.

Thornton's big day last Thursday was a regular one and drew a crowd of close to five thousand people to the doings. A big roast ox dinner was served free to the crowd, and with five thousand buns the committee in charge of the eats ran short long before the crowd was served. The Rockwell band furnished music for the occasion, and the Thornton and Hampton ball teams the main feature of the sports program, the latter team winning by a score of 6 to 0. A comical parade, in which the merchants and the farmers endeavored to out-do each other was a feature of the day, as was a pulling contest between a steam engine and a gasoline tractor. The tractor won the contest, but they say that the test was rather unfair to the steam engine as they held the engine to 125 pounds of steam while the tractor opened her wide. Various races and other contests were on the program, including a big dance in the evening, and a "large" time is reported by those who attended from Belmond.

The Independent was incorrect in its statement last week that the ladies of the M. E. Aid society conducted the stand at the picnic. The stand was run by the cemetery association, and the Independent begs pardon for the mistake.

Kanawha defeated Belmond Sunday 3 to 2.

Henry Steinlicht will leave next week for a farm near Kanawha which he will work this coming year. We regret to lose Henry as a neigrbor and citizen, and hope that after he gets in his new home that he won't start rooting for the Kanawha ball team.

Mrs. J. F. Henn took her young son to the hospital at Iowa City last Trursday for examination.

An event of unusual interest occured at Hampton last week when a horse ran away. The Hampton Recorder considered the item of such news value that it placed a "head" on it and ran it on the front page. Well, when you come to think about it, it is a rather unusual happening nowadays. The fact was amply demonstrated at the picnic last Wednesday, when there were four buggies to be seen. Ten years ago how many horses and buggies and how many automobiles would have been present if the crowd had been as large as at the picnic this year?

Monitor: Two trainloads of raisins estimated at 4,000 tons passed thru Clarion Sunday. They were from Fresno, Cal., and consigned to eastern points and Canada. Two special trains of seventy-one cars took care of the consignment which the Great Western received from the Sante Fe. Both trains were run over this division on passenger schedule. H. W. Ensign accompanied one of the trains from Omaha to Clarion. It is estimated that the freight charges would be fully $28,00 on each of the shipments. Now somebody wants to know how many pies and cakes such a quantity of raisins would make. A thirsty fellow says the lot would make enough "hootch" to float a whole navy, with plenty of drinks for the crews.

FARM BUREAU NEWS ITEMS

BELMOND PICNIC A SUCCESS

Attorney Dunn of Mason City Gave Principal Address

One of the largest community gatherings ever held in the vicinity of Belmond was staged last Wednesday, August the 24th, when about 2,500 people of Belmond and the four townships immediately surrounding that place assembled at the Franklin grove, just south of town for the community farm bureau picnic.

The morning program consisted of a number of selections by the Belmond Community band, several readings by local talent, a goodly number of vocal solos, and quartettes by several from the various townships, a few recitations, a short play and the splendid address by the speaker of the day. The afternoon program was given to horseshoe pitching, racing contests of various kinds, tug-of-war, and a baseball game by the players from Iowa and Pleasant townships on one team and players from Grant and Belmond townships on the other.

The outstanding feature of the entire program was the splendid address given by Mr. E. G. Dunn, one of the leading and successful attorneys of Mason City. Mr. Dunn's former connection with the organization of farmers' elevators of the state of Iowa will be remembered by all farmers who took active part in this mowement for the establishment of farmers' elevators in the state. It was this close connection with farm interests and farmers problems that makes it possible for Mr. Dunn to talk in such an interesting way to farmers concerning their farm operations. Mr. Dunn devoted considerable time in the fore part of his speech to the discussion of the world war and the influence this great conflict has had in an indirect way on the farming interests of our great country. In speaking of world conditions Mr. Dunn said "What is wrong with America? Nothing. The trouble is that individuals are looking out for themselves and they don't seem to care for their neighbors." He urged upon his listeners the necessity of laying aside selfish interests and work for the good of the entire community He spent considerable time in discussing the conditions which are responsible for the agricultural situation at the present time and suggested measures which can be taken to bring about improved conditions. The one thought which seemed to be foremost thruout his entire speech was that of getting away from selfishness on the part of individuals in a community and in his closing remarks he said, "I hope you people will make a survey of your community and go to work to help those who need help instead of waiting until they are sold out under judgement and then see how cheaply you can buy their belongings."

The people of the entire community of Belmond should be congratulated upon the splendid spirit of cooperation which was exhibited at this farm bureau picnic when the farmers and business men of the community touched shoulders with one another in thought and conversation. The business men of Belmond sould be commended for their spirit of co-operation and helpfulness as shown by the closing of the various business houses for this community affair.

BOONE TOWNSHIP PICNIC

The farmers of Boone township took time out last Thursday to enjoy a good old time community picnic and met at Smith's park near Renwick for a day of festivity and fun making,. The morning program consisting of community songs, vocal solos, recitations, dialogues, readings, and a splendid address by A. J. Shinn of Woodbine, Harrison county. Mr. Shinn a farmer who owns and operates a farm of over 500 acres, talked to the people of Boone township as a farmer who is in the game himself and who has made a thoro study of farm conditions truout the state. The afternoon program was taken up with several athletic stunts including horse shoe pitching, races of various kinds and a good live ball game between two of the local teams.

LIVELY SOCIAL IN NORWAY

A lively community social gathering was held Friday evening, August 26, when about five or six hundred Norway township farmers met for a social mix. A program made up entirely of home talent numbers was enjoyed by all. A short talk was given by the county agent who talked upon the main farm bureau problems of the day and who urged a closer co-operation among the farmers in supporting their own organization.

One of the features of the evening was the refreshment stand on the lawn of the farm home, where ice cream and cake and all kinds of cold drinks were served. The people were entertained during the latter part of the program with several wrestling bouts by several young men of the community.

POULTRY CULLING GIVES GOOD RESULTS

A series of poultry culling demonstrations which covered the entire county with three demonstrations in each township was completed last Friday when the last demonstration was held in Liberty township.

Record cards, showing the number of eggs prduced for a fourteen day period previous to the time of culling also for a fourteen day period after culling are beginning to come into the office and when the last cards have arrived, which will be about Sept. 15th results will be printed showing total number of birds culled and the total egg production both before and after culling.

It may be said roughly at present that between 20 and 25 per cent of the birds of each flock were culled out as non-layers or slacker hens while the egg production of the whole flock was reduced only 5 per cent. Definite figures will be published in the October issue of the Exchange.

THE MAN WHO WINS

The man who wins is the man who does,
The man who makes things hum buzz,
The man who works and the man who acts
Who buildts on a basis of solid facts.
Who doesn't sit down to moan and dream
Who humps ahead with the force of steam,
Who hasn't te time to fuss and fret,
But gets there every time—you bet.
The man who wins is the man who climbs
The ladder of life to the cheery chimes
Of the bells of labor, the bells of toil,
And isn't afraid his skin will spoil
If he faces the shine of the glaring sun,
And works in the light till his task is done;
A human engine with triple beam
And a hundred and fifty pounds of steam.

LET US HELP MAKE EFFICENCY POSSIBLE

The amount of misdirected mail daily is almost inconceivable. Let us turn over a new leaf before we ask the postoffice department to do so. The following clipping, reported as an official fact, will give us some idea of the amount of mail that is misdirected:

350,000 misdirected mail pieces are handled daily at the New York post office, which includes Manhattan only. This means 127,750,000 misdirected pieces are handled every year in this one metropoltan center. It requires no imagination to appreciate what this means by the way of hampering and slowing down the postal service. Great armies of postal clerks who might otherwise be engaged in facilitating the general service, are thus tied down to the problem of rectifying the mistakes and supplying the ommissions that are chargeable to careless correspondents. We Americans sort of take our postal service for granted. We kick like a steer when one letter out of the millions handled daily goes astray or is delayed for a few hours; yet we are so neglectful of our own responsibilities in this connection that we pile thousands of pieces of misdrected mail into the postoffice and expect that the postal machinery can and must in some way surmount your own negligence.

The Nen York situation is merely typical of the situation in every other city in the land. Take Grand Rapids, for example. Postmaster Hogadone says that as nearly as can be estimated, the local post office handles 5,000 pieces of misdirected mail every twenty-four hours; and in addition thereto, about 20,000 pieces of mail are received without street addresses. It repaires the full time of five clerks in Grand Rapids alone to correcr the addresses on misdirected mail. The mail without complete address is the cause of loss of time to distributors who could otherwise have been employed in handling properly and fully addressed mail, thereby making it possible in many instances to give an earlier delivery. We who constantly yell for "greater economy" and greater efficiency" in the public service may well pause and ask ourselves whether it would not be a good thing, a consistent thing, if we took a little more care in making "economy" and efficiency" in the public service possible.

Some of the more common mistakes in addressing mail are noted as follows: Addresses are written hastily and illegibly, often in lead pencil; pencil addresses become obliterated in the course of handling. Abbreviations in the names of firms, postoffices and states, are confusing and invite trouble; for instance, contemplate the similarity in the abbreviations of "Pa." for Pennsylvania, "La." for Louisiana and "Ia."for Iowa; also "Col." for Colorado and "Cal." for California. Unless all letters in these abbreviations are written very plainly, there is danger of mistakes. Street addresses are often omitted; and obsolete mailing lists are the bane of postal existence.

All these things considered it is really a wonder that the post office makes as few mistakes as it does. When one thinks of the 5,000 misdirected pieces of mail in Grand Rapids daily—and 350,000 pieces in New York—and when one multiplies an average figure by the number of postoffices in the country, it is necessary to confess that the people do not do their whole part in the matter of postal efficiency. If we are going to throw stones we must not live in glass houses. We are all demanding of the post office department that it turn over a new leaf under its peppy new Washington chief. Let us turn over a new leaf, too.

DOES NOT PAY TO BURN CORN.

Recent suggestions that corn may be used as a fuel in Iowa this winter due to low prices, have again brot up the question: Is corn a cheap fuel?

Iowa State College investigators believe it is not. They say coal will have to go much higher or corn become almost valueless before it will pay to burn the latter. They base their belief on experimental work carried on by the engineering experiment station in which corn was analyzed in comparison with coal for heating qualities.

The engineering experiment station in the laboratories found that Iowa coal which generally sells around $10 per ton would have to sell at $20 per ton before it would begin to pay to burn corn worth 47 cents for a 75 pound bushel. They also found that corn is a poor burner, acting like green cord wood and requiring a lot of attention in firing

Corn with 10 per cent moisture, the winter average, gave off only 7540 British thermal units of heat per pound while Iowa coal gave off 12,000 B. T. U. per pound. At this rate, they claim, corn could become very cheap and still be expensive fuel.

Members of the agricultural staff say that cheap corn can be utilized as feed and shipped to market as meat products and give a real profit. Cheap corn means that feeding operations can be handled with more profit to feeders since corn is the basic ration in the middle west.

THERE'S AN old gag.

AND A chap told me.
THAT THIS described.
SOME SMOKES he'd tried
THEY DIDN'T exactly.
MAKE HIM mad.
BUT HE wasn't.
SO VERY well pleased.
OF COURSE that was.
MY CUE to slip him.
A REAL cigarette.
AND AFTER he'd taken.
A GOOD pull or two.
INTO HIS constitution.
HE GRINNED and said.
"THE ONLY way these.
WILL EVER make you mad.
IS THE way.
YOUR FRIENDS eat 'em up.
I ONLY hope you've got.

A LITTLE CHAT
Why We Do Not Have Many Sales

We believe that we have an entirely different theory of merchandising. Instead of taking in everything that can be sold at a profit, we do as many of the cottagers do at Clear Lake, namely, we put up at our windows and doors a species of mosquito netting strong enough to shut out every kind of merchandise that leaves a bit of sting upon our customers.

Studying closely our customer's likings, we secure at sources of production and purchase for spot cash down, what we believe they desire, and mark everything at fair prices at the beginning of the season, which prices are adjusted affresh with every change in the markets, so that they sell quickly and therefore we do not need to have odds and ends, helter skelter, hurry scurry sales every few days and a hury burly, come quick riddance sale now and then.

Does it not seem silly to put such big prices on when the goods come in and then be obliged to mark them down so much to get them sold?

Think it over for yourself.

A MAN FOR THE AGES

A STORY OF THE BUILDERS of DEMOCRACY

By IRVING BACHELLER

COPYRIGHT IRVING BACHELLER

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Samson and Sarah Traylor, with their two children, Josiah and Betsey, travel by wagon from their home in Vergennes, Vt., to the West, the land of plenty. Their destination is the Country of the Sangamon, in Illinois.

CHAPTER II.—At Niagara Falls they meet a party of immigrants, among them a youth named John McNeil, who also decides to go to the Sangamon country. All of the party suffer from fever and ague. Sarah's ministrations save the life of a youth, Harry Needles, in the last stages of fever, and he accompanies the Traylors. They reach New Salem, Illinois, and are welcomed by young "Abe" Lincoln.

CHAPTER III.—Among the Traylors' first acquaintances are Lincoln's friends, Jack Kelso and his pretty daughter Bim, 16 years of age.

CHAPTER IV.—Samson decides to locate at New Salem, and begins building his house. Led by Jack Armstrong, rowdies attempt to break up the proceedings. Lincoln thrashes Armstrong. Young Harry Needles strikes Bap McNoll, of the Armstrong crowd, and McNoll threatens vengeance.

CHAPTER V.—A few days later Harry, alone, is attacked by McNoll and his gang, and would have been roughly used had not Bim driven off his assailants with a shotgun. John McNeil, the Traylors' Niagara Falls acquaintance, is markedly attentive to Ann Rutledge. Lincoln is in love with Ann, but has never had enough courage to tell her so.

CHAPTER VI. — Traylor helps two slaves, who had run away from St. Louis, to escape. Eliphalet Biggs, owner of the slaves, following them, attempts to beat up Traylor and in a fight has his arm broken.

CHAPTER VII.—Waiting for his arm to heal, Biggs meets Bim Kelso, with whom Harry Needles has fallen in love. Biggs asks for Bim's hand, but her father refuses his consent. Biggs returns to St. Louis.

CHAPTER VIII.—Bim confesses to Harry that she loves Biggs, and the youth is disconsolate. Lincoln decides to seek a seat in the legislature. He and Harry volunteer for the Black Hawk war, and leave New Salem.

CHAPTER IX.—Biggs comes back to the village and he and Bim elope. Harry learns of it on his way home from the "war." Lincoln's advice and philosophy sustain him in his grief.

CHAPTER X.—Lincoln, defeated in his candidacy for the legislature, forms a partnership with "Bill" Berry in the grocery business. Biggs sends a gang to burn Traylor's house, but the New Salem men are warned and the raiders worsted.

CHAPTER XI.—Lincoln, now postmaster, decides to run again for the legislature. Ann Rutledge is openly in love with John McNeil. He leaves for his home in the East, promising to return soon and marry Ann. Lincoln accepts his defeat manfully. No word coming from McNeil, Ann confesses to Abe that his real name is McNamar, and her fears that he will not return. Lincoln in his deep love endeavors to reassure her, though he shares her misgivings. Lincoln wins his seat in the legislature.

CHAPTER XII.—Ann hears from McNamar, but his letter is cold and she is convinced he does not love her. She tells Abe of her doubt, and he confesses his love and asks her to marry him. Ann declares she does not yet love him, but will try to. With that promise Lincoln sets out for Vandalia and his legislative duties.

CHAPTER XIII.—Inspired by Elijah Lovejoy, Traylor arranges on his farm a hiding place for runaway slaves, a station on the "Underground Railroad."

CHAPTER XIV.—Ann agrees to marry Abe, but her health is wrecked. Three runaway slaves seek Traylor's help in escaping. They belong to Biggs and he comes in pursuit of them. Threatened with arrest for inciting the raid on Traylor, he flees. One of the fugitives is Bim in disguise. She has fled from her husband's cruelty.

CHAPTER XV.—Dying, Ann Rutledge calls for Abe, and he bids her farewell at her bedside. Following her demise a settled sadness descends on him. He is no longer "Abe," but "Abraham Lincoln."

CHAPTER XVI.—Overcoming his despondency, Lincoln returns to his work. Abolition sentiment is crystalizing and he throws himself into the movement.

CHAPTER XVII.—Traylor sells his farm and moves to Springfield. Lincoln plans to secure a divorce for Bim in order that she may marry Harry Needles, whom she has always really loved. McNamar returns to New Salem, too late.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Traylor and Harry Needles visit the "boom" city of Chicago, where Bim, now the mother of a son, is living with her parents. She has her divorce. Harry leaves for the Seminole war. An unscrupulous, rich speculator, Lionel Davis, desires to marry Bim, but she repulses him.

CHAPTER XIX.—Ruined by the panic of '37, Kelso dies and Bim and her mother are left penniless. Davis presses his suit, and, made desperate by the news of Harry's death, Bim almost makes up her mind to marry him.

CHAPTER XX.—Lincoln is admitted to the bar. Traylor ascertains that the report of Harry's death is false. He hurries to Chicago. Davis has swindled Brimstead, a friend of Traylor's, in real estate deals, and Traylor seeks to collect the money. Smallpox breaks out at Honey Creek, and Bim goes there as a nurse.

CHAPTER XXI.—Lincoln at Springfield enters into his life work. Harry Needles comes home and at once seeks Bim.

CHAPTER XXII.—Lincoln wins Brimstead's suit against Davis, thoroughly discrediting the speculator. As an outcome, Harry, resenting an insult to Traylor, fights a duel with Davis, in which both are wounded.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Lincoln meets Mary Todd and after a strange courtship wins her. Harry Needles, following a period of recuperation, returns to Chicago thoroughly restored to health.

The young soldier looked about him and smiled.

"This is wonderful!" he exclaimed. "To whom are we indebted?"

"You don't think I'd bring you out here on the plains and marry you and not treat you well," Bim laughed. "I warned you that you'd have to take what came and that the hospitality would be simple."

"It's a noble and benevolent conspiracy that has turned this cabin into a paradise and brought all this happiness upon me," he said as he kissed her. "I thought it strange that Mr. Nuckles should be on hand at the right moment."

"The creek was a harder thing to manage!" she answered with a smile. "I told my messenger to see that the gate of the reservoir was opened at four o'clock. So, you see, you had to marry or swim. Now I've made a clean breast of it. I felt sure something would happen before you got back from Milwaukee. I was plum superstitious about it."

The young man shook with laughter and said: "You are the new woman born of the democracy of the West."

"I began to fear that I should be an old woman before I got to be Mrs. Needles."

"Whose house is this?" he asked in a moment.

"It is the home of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Lukins. Their land near Chicago is now used for a cattle yard and slaughterhouse and is paying them a good income. They moved here some time ago. He looks after the reservoir. Mrs. Lukins is a famous cook, as you will see. We can stay here as long as we want to. We shall find everything we need in the well, the chimney, the butt'ry and the cellar. And here is the wedding supper all ready for us and I as hungry as a bear."

"In the words of Mrs. Lukins 'it is very copasetic,' and I begin to feel that I have made some progress in the study of Bim Kelso. Come, let's have our supper."

"Not until you have broiled a piece of venison. It will take a lot of food to satisfy me. I'll get the cream and butter out of the well and make a pot of coffee. Hurry up, Harry, I'm starving."

Darkness fell upon the busy lovers and soon the firelight and the glow of many candles filled the homely cabin with flickering shadows and a soft, beautiful color.

"Supper is ready," she said, when the venison steak had been deposited on the platter.

"Bim, I love you not as most men love," he said as they stood a moment by the side of the table. "From the bottom of my heart I do respect you for your honor and good faith and when I think of that and of all you have suffered for my sake, I bow my head and ask God to make me worthy of such a helper."

They sat down to this unusual wedding feast, and as we leave them the windows of the little cabin fling their light far out upon the level plain: we hear the sound of merry laughter and of the tall grasses rustling and reeling joyously in the breeze. The moon in mid-heaven and the innumerable host around it seem to know what is passing on the edge of the Grand Prairie and to be well pleased. Surely there is nothing that finds a quicker echo in the great heart of the world than human happiness!

CHAPTER XXV.

Being a Brief Memoir by the Honorable and Venerable Man Known in These Pages as Josiah Traylor, Who Saw the Great Procession of Events Between Andrew Jackson and Woodrow Wilson and Especially the Making and the End of Lincoln.

Now, as I have done often sitting in the chimney corner at the day's end, I look back at my youth and manhood and tell, with one eye upon the clock, of those years of fulfillment in the progress of our beloved pilgrim. There are four and twenty of them that I shall try to review in as many minutes. At this distance I see only the high places—one looming above another like steps in a stairway.

The years of building and sentiment ended on the fourth of November, 1842, when he and Mary Todd were joined in marriage. Now, like one having taken note of the storm clouds, he strengthens the structure.

Mary tried to teach him fine manners. It was a difficult undertaking. Often, as might have been expected, she lost her patience. Mary was an excellent girl, but rather kindlesome and pragmatic. Like most of the prairie folk, for instance, Abe Lincoln had been accustomed to reach for the butter with his own knife, and to find rest in attitudes extremely indolent and unbecoming. He enjoyed sprawling on the floor in his shirt-sleeves and slippers with a pillow under his head and a book in his hand. He had a liking for ample accommodation, not fully satisfied by a bed or a lounge. Mary undertook to turn him into new ways and naturally there was irritation in the house, but I think they got along very well together for all that. Mary grew fond of him and proud of his great talents and was a devoted wife. For years she did the work of the house and bore him children. He milked the cow and took care of the horse when he was at home.

Annabel and I, having just been married, went with him to Washington on our wedding tour in 1847. He was taking his seat in congress that year. We were with him there when he met Webster. Lincoln was deeply impressed by the quiet dignity of the great man. We went together to hear Emerson lecture. It was a motley audience—business men, fashionable ladies and gentlemen, statesmen, politicians, women with their knitting and lion-hunters. The tall, awkward orator ascended the platform, took off his top-coat and drew a manuscript from his pocket. He had a narrow, sloping forehead, a prominent nose, gray eyes and a skin of singular transparency. His voice was rich and mellow, but not strong. Lincoln listened with rapt attention to his talk about Democracy. It was a memorable night. He spoke of it often. Such contact with the great spirits of that time, of which he studiously availed himself in Washington, was of great value to the statesman from Illinois. His experiences on the floor were in no way important to him, but since 1914 I have thought often of what he said there, regarding Polk's invasion of Mexico, unauthorized by congress as it was:

"The provision of the Constitution giving the war-making power to congress was dictated, as I understand it, by the following reasons: Kings had always been involving and impoverishing their people in wars, pretending generally that the good of the people was the object. This our convention understood to be the most oppressive of all kingly oppressions and they proposed to so frame the constitution that no man should hold the power of bringing this oppression upon us."

The next year he stumped Massachusetts for "Zach" Taylor and heard Gov. Seward deliver his remarkable speech on slavery, which contained this striking utterance:

"Congress has no power to inhibit any duty commanded by God on Mount Sinai or by His Son on the Mount of Olives."

On his return home Lincoln confessed that we had soon to deal with that question.

I was in his office when Herndon said:

"I tell you that slavery must be rooted out."

"What makes you think so?" Mr. Lincoln asked.

"I feel it in my bones," was Herndon's answer.

After that he used to speak with respect of "Bill Herndon's bone philosophy."

His term in congress having ended, he came back to the law in partnership with William H. Herndon—a man of character and sound judgment. Those days Lincoln wore black trousers, coat and stock, a waistcoast of satin and a Wellington high hat. He was wont to carry his papers in his hat. Mary had wrought a great change in his external appearance.

They used to call him "a dead square lawyer." I remember that once Herndon had drawn up a fictitious plea founded on a shrewd assumption. Lincoln carefuly examined the papers.

"Is it founded on fact?" he asked.

"No," Herndon answered.

Lincoln scratched his head thoughtfuly and asked:

"Billy, hadn't we better withdraw that plea? You know it's a sham and generally that's another name for a lie. Don't let it go on record. The cursed thing may come staring us in the face long after this suit has been forgotten."

On the whole he was not so communicative as he had been in his young manhood. He suffered days of depression when he said little. Often, in good company, he seemed to be thinking of things in no way connected with the talk. Mary called him a rather "shut-mouthed man."

Herndon used to say that the only thing he had against Lincoln was his habit of coming in mornings and sprawling on the lounge and reading aloud from the newspaper.

The people of the town loved him. One day, as we were walking along the street together, we came upon a girl dressed up and crying in front of her father's door.

"What's the matter?" Lincoln asked.

"I want to take the train and the wagon hasn't come for my trunk," said she.

Lincoln went in and got the trunk and carried it to the station on his back, with people laughing and throwing jokes at him as he strode along. When I think of him, his chivalry and kindness come first to mind.

He read much, but his days of book study were nearly ended. His learning was now got mostly in the school of experience. Herndon says, and I think it is true, that he never read to the end of a law book those days. The study of authorities was left to the junior partner. His reading was mostly outside the law. His knowledge of science was derived from Chambers' Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation.

He was still afraid of the Abolition Movement in 1852 and left town to avoid a convention of its adherents. He thought the effort to resist by force the laws of Kansas was criminal and would hurt the cause of freedom. "Let us have peace and revolutionize through the ballot box," he urged.

In 1854, a little quarrel in New York began to weave the thread of destiny. Seward, Weed and Greeley had wielded decisive power in the party councils of that state. Seward was a high-headed, popular idol. His plans and his triumphant progress absorbed his thought. Weed was dazzled by the splendor of this great star. Neither gave a thought to their able colleague—a poor man struggling to build up a great newspaper. An office, with fair pay, would have been a help in those days. But he got no recognition of his needs and talents and services. Suddenly he wrote a letter to Weed in which he said:

"The firm of Seward, Weed and Greeley is hereby dissolved by the resignation of its junior member."

When Greeley had grown in power and wisdom until his name was known and honored from ocean to ocean, they tried to make peace with him, but in vain.

Then suddenly a new party and a new Lincoln were born on the same day in 1856, at a great meeting in Bloomington, Illinois. There his soul was to come into its stateliest mansion out of its lower vaulted past. For him the fulness of time had arrived. He was prepared for it. His intellect had also reached the fulness of its power. Now his great right hand was ready for the thunderbolts which his spirit had been slowly forging. God called him in the voices of the crowd. He was quick to answer. He went up the steps to the platform. I saw, as he came forward, that he had taken the cross upon him. Oh, it was a memorable thing to see the smothered flame of his spirit leaping into his face. His hands were on his hips. He seemed to grow taller as he advanced. The look of him reminds me now of what the famous bronze founder in Paris said of the death-mask, that it was the most beautiful head and face he had ever seen. What shall I say of his words save that it seemed to me that the voice of God was in them? The reporters forgot to report. It is a lost speech. There is no record of it. I suppose it was scribbled with a pencil on scraps of paper and on the backs of envelopes at sundry times, agreeably with his habit, and committed to memory. So this great speech, called by some the noblest effort of his life, was never printed. I remember one sentence, relating to the Nebraska bill.

"Let us use ballots, not bullets, against the weapons of violence, which are those of kingcraft. Their fruits are the dying bed of the fearless Sumner, the ruins of the Free State hotel, the smoking timbers of the Herald of Freedom, the governor of Kansas chained to a stake like a horse-thief."

In June, 1858, he took the longest step of all. The Republican state convention had endorsed him for the United States senate. It was then that he wrote on envelopes and scraps of paper at odd moments, when his mind was off duty, the speech beginning:

"A house divided against itself must fall. Our government can not long endure part slave and part free."

I was among the dozen friends to whom he read that speech in the State house library. One said of those first sentences: "It is a fool utterance." Another: "It is ahead of its time." Another declared that it would drive away the Democrats who had lately joined the party. Herndon and I were the only ones who approved it.

Lincoln had come to another fork in the road. For a moment I wondered which way he would go.

Immediately he rose and said with an emphasis that silenced opposition:

"Friends, this thing has been held back long enough. The time has come when these sentiments should be uttered, and if it is decreed that I shall go down because of this speech, then let me go down linked to the truth."

His conscience prevailed. The speech was delivered. Douglas, the Democratic candidate, came on from Washington to answer it. That led to Lincoln's challenge to a joint debate. I was with him through that long campaign. Douglas was the more finished orator. Lincoln spoke as he split rails. His conscience was his beetle. He drove his arguments deep into the souls of his hearers. The great thing about him was his conscience. Unless his theme were big enough to give it play in noble words he could be as commonplace as any one. He was built for a tool of God in tremendous moral issues. He was awkward and diffident in beginning a speech. Often his hands were locked behind him. He gesticulated more with his head than his hands. He stood square-toed always. He never walked about on the platform. He scored his points with the long, bony, index finger of his right hand. Sometimes he would hang a hand on the lapel of his coat as if to rest it. Perspiration dripped from his face. His voice, high pitched at first, mellowed into a pleasant sound.

One sentence in Lincoln's speech at Ottawa thrust "The Little Giant" of Illinois out of his way forever. It was this pregnant query:

"Can the people of a United States territory in any lawful way and against the wish of any citizen of the United States exclude slavery from its limits prior to the formation of a state constitution?"

He knew that Douglas would answer yes and that, doing so, he would alienate the South and destroy his chance to be President two years later. That is exactly what came to pass. "The Little Giant's" answer was the famous "Freeport Heresy." He was elected to the senate, but was no longer possible as a candidate for the presidency.

I come now to the last step in the career of my friend and beloved master. It was the Republican convention of 1860 in Chicago. I was a delegate. The New Yorkers came in white beaver hats, enthusiastic for Seward, their favorite son. He was the man we dreaded most. Many in the great crowd were wearing his colors. The delegations were in earnest session the night before the balloting began. The hotel corridors were thronged with excited men. My father had become a man of wealth and great influence in Illinois. I was with him when he went into the meeting of the Michigan delegates and talked to them. He told how he came West in a wagon and saw the spirit of America in the water floods of Niagara and saw again the spirit of America in the life of the boy, Abe Lincoln, then flowing toward its manhood. When he sat down, the Honorable Dennis Flanagan arose and told of meeting the Traylor party at the Falls, when he was driving an ox-team, in a tall beaver hat; how he had remembered their good advice and cookies and jerked venison.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I am willing to take the word of a man whose name is hallowed by my dearest recollections. And believing what he has said of Abraham Lincoln, I am for him on the second ballot."

The green Irish lad, whom I remember dimly, had become a great political chieftain and his words had much effect. There was a stir among the delegates. I turned and saw the tall form of Horace Greeley entering the door. His big, full face looked rather serious. He wore gold-bowed spectacles. He was smooth-shaven save for the silken, white, throat beard that came out from under his collar. His head was bald on top with soft, silvered locks over each ear. They called on him to speak. He stepped forward and said slowly in a high-pitched drawl:

"Gentlemen, this is my speech: On your second ballot vote for Abraham Lincoln of Illinois."

He bowed and left the room and visited many delegations, and everywhere expressed his convictions in this formula. Backed by his tremendous personality and influence, the simple words were impressive. I doubt not they turned scores of men from Seward to the great son of Illinois.

Then—the campaign with its crowds its enthusiasm, its Vesuvian mutterings. There was a curious touch of humor and history in its banners. Here are three of them:

"Menard County for the Tal Sucker."

"We are for old Abe the Giant Killer."

"Link on to Lincoln."

Then—those last days in Springfield He came to the office the afternoon before he left and threw himself on the lounge and talked of bygone days with Herndon.

"Billy, how long have we been together?" he asked.

"Sixteen years."

"Never a cross word."

"Never."

"Keep the old sign hanging. A little thing like the election of a President should make no change in the firm of Lincoln and Herndon. If I live, I'm coming back some time and then we'll go right on with the practice of the law as if nothing had happened."

Then—that Monday morning in Springfield, at eight o'clock, on the eleventh of February, the train bore him toward the great task of his life. Hannah Armstrong, who had foxed his trousers in New Salem, and the venerable Doctor Allen and the Brimsteads, and Aleck Ferguson, bent with age, and Harry Needles and Bim and their four handsome children, and my father and mother, and Betsey, my maiden sister, and Eli Frendenberg were there in the crowd to bid him good-by.

A quartet sang. Mr. Lincoln asked his friends and neighbors to pray for his success. He was moved by the sight of them and could not have said much if he had tried. The bell rang. The train started. He waved his hand and was gone. Not many of us who stood trying to see through our tears were again to look upon him. The years of preparation were ended and those of sacrifice had begun.

Now, we are at the foot of the last hill. For a long time I had seen it looming in the distance. Those days it filled my heart with a great fear. Now, how beautiful, how lonely it seems! Oh, but what a vineyard on that very fruitful hill! I speak low when I think of it. Harry Needles and I were on our way to Washington that fateful night of April 14, 1865. We reached there at an early hour in the morning. We made our way through the crowded streets to the little house opposite Ford's theater. An officer who knew me cleared a way for us to the door. Reporters, statesmen, citizens and their families were massed in the street waiting with tear-stained faces for the end. Some of them were sobbing as we passed. We were admitted without delay. A minister and the doctor sat by the bedside The latter held an open watch in his hand. I could hear it ticking the last moments in an age of history. What a silence as the great soul of my friend was "breaking camp to go home." Friends of the family and members of the cabinet were in the room. Through the open door of a room beyond I saw Mrs. Lincoln and the children and others. We looked at our friend lying on the bed. His kindly face was pale and haggard. He breathed faintly and at long intervals. His end was near.

"Poor Abe!" Harry whispered as he looked down at him. "He has had to die on the cross."

To most of those others Lincoln was the great statesman. To Harry he was the beloved Abe who had shared his fare and his hardships in many a long, weary way.

The doctor put his ear against the breast of the dying man. There was a moment in which we could hear the voices in the street. The doctor rose and said: "He is gone."

Secretary Stanton, who more than once had spoken lightly of him, came to the bedside and tenderly closed the eyes of his master, saying:

"Now, he belongs to the ages."

We went out of the door. The sound of mourning was in the streets. A dozen bells were tolling. On the corner of Tenth street a quartet of negroes was singing that wonderful prayer:

"Swing low, sweet chariot, comin' for to carry me home."

One of them, whose rich, deep bass thrilled me and all who heard it, was Roger Wentworth, the fugitive, who had come to our house with Bim, in the darkness of the night, long before.

[THE END.]

THINGS TO BE DONE IN SEPTEMBER

Pick Seed Corn

For the best results seed corn should be picked from the field before the first frost. In Iowa the first frost may be expected about September 20. Therefore, seed corn should ordinarily be picked before that date.

Seed winter Grains

Winter wheat and rye should be seeded, for the best results, during the last week in August or the first week in September. This allows plenty of time for formation of a good root system before severe freezing occurs. If the frosts come late and the grain to joint, it should be pastured or clipped high with a mower.

Wean calves and lambs

Early springs lambs and calves should be weaned late in August or early in September so that the cows and ewes can fatten up for the winter.

Hogging Down Corn

Many pork producers in south Dakota practice turning their pigs into the cornfield about this time of the year to pick their own feed instead of gathering the corn and hauling it to them. This practice saves the farmer much labor, the pigs do well under these conditions, and the manure is distributed over the fields as a fertilizer.

How About A Vacation

The farm work has been heavy this summer and has kept the farmer close to home. But the early harvest ought to give him a chance to get away for a vacation of at least a day or two. If a car is available, as is usually the case, the practice of one farmer in taking a little trip with a picnic dinner each day might well be followed. Thus one could see what the neighbors have been doing, what crops they have raised, what improvements they have made and how they have made them. The family would enjoy such trips, also.

TAKE CARE OF ALL PIGS

Fall pigs which are farrowed the latter part of August or the first of September can be produced nearly as cheaply as spring pigs if they are given the opportunity to make good growth before cold weather sets in According to R. G. Anderson of the animal husbandry department at Ia. State College, this can be accomplished by a little extra care.

In order to overcome the handicap of cold weather and the lack of green crops in raising fall pigs, a little extra care must be taken with their feed. While the pigs are still suckling the sow get them to eating a little dry feed. A self feeder in a creep containing corn, oats, and tankage will give them a balanced ration and keep them growing. Or the pigs may be given a slop of whole or skim-milk and wheat middlings.

After the pigs are weaned they should be fed liberally at all times of a well balanced ration, to keep them in a thrifty condition. Give them plenty of salt at all times. Fall pigs need a good, warm, dry, and well ventilated place to sleep, with plenty of clean, dry bedding.

PUT NEW SILAGE ON OLD

Where a silo still contains a part of last year's filling of ensilage there is no danger of placing new silage on top of the old, say the farm crops department of Iowa State College. By taking the proper precautions the old silage can hardly be detected a year later.

When filling starts, be sure and remove the top layer of moldy silage from the last years silage. Then place the new silage right on the old and wet it down thoroly so as to exclude air from this section.

In filling last years silo it is a good plan to examine all the doors and see that they are in good condition so that air will not enter thru cracks or places where boards are cracked. Air soon causes chemical action in the silage which will spoil it for uses as feed.

School Days Are Here

Franklin said "Empty your purse into your head and nobody can take it away from you." In other words, Education is the best paying investment that any person can make.

School will begin Monday September 5th, and we hope to make this school year the best and biggest in the history of the Belmond Schools.

Last year, because of the exceptional high wages paid, a number of our students dropped out of school to earn money. Now that wages are lower and labors plentiful, it is time for you to re-enter school and complete you High School Course. Your teachers and school mates will welcome you back to good earnest work.

This year the Vocational Agricultural Course will be in charge of Mr. Christie. We recommend this course to all boys who live on a farm and expect to -return to the -farm after completing their High School Course. This course deals with the farm, better methods of farming, and the present day farm problems. It is an exellent opportunity for the boy on the farm who will not be able to attend an Agricultural College to get advanced work in agriculture.

A small pamphlet has been issued by the Board and will be given to each High School student as he enrolls. This pamphlet explains briefly the course of study and regulations of the school and school be filed for tuture references.

Special attention is called to the enrollment as follows, and High School students not enrolling as per schedule need not expect the Program of Classes altered to suit their pleasure when school opens Monday morning.

Enrollment Schedule

Juniors -- Friday Sept. 2nd- 9:00-12:00
Seniors --- Fri. Sept. 2nd -- 2:00-5 :00
Sophomores--Sat. Sept. 3rd -9:00-12:00
Freshmen --- Sat. Sept. 3rd - 1:30-5:00

Pupils entering the grades for the first time, bring your report card to the Superintendent's office Thursday Sept. 1st from 2:00—4:00.

Pupils entering the Kindergarten must be five years of age or will be five years old by December 1st. Pupils will not be enrolled in the kindergarten after October 14th for this school year.

Tuition in the grades is $6.00, High School $10.00.

Rural Eighth grade graduates will bring g their diploma issued by the County Superintendent in order that you may be checked for exemption for personal tuition.

The faculty wish to ask that the parents continue the co-operation given us last year, thru this school year. Plan to visit school several times this year, and get acquainted with the teachers and obtain a definite knowledge of the plan and character of the work that is done. We are very glad to have you attend our literary programs, but we wish you to visit the regular classes as well.

STREETS OF BELMOND ARE RENAMED

Home Team Is Playing Real Ball

First Game Goes To Clarion 9 To 7; 11 Inning Game Played At Garner

PLAYING ALL HOME MEN

The home ball team has been putting up some sensational ball playing since its reorganization, and altho it has lost the two games played, the team may feel justly proud of its record to date.

Monday they met Brown's Colts of Clarion, and as it was the first game of the newly organized club they did not play as good as they can. The result was nine to seven for the county seaters, but they had to earn it. Clarence Obrecht of Thornton was in the box for Belmond, while the Colts had the noted Wilson.

Tuesday afternoon at the Garner tournament the home boys met the aggregation from Dows, and altho they lost the game, 2 to 1, it took Dows 11 innings of the most sensational ball playing to do it.

The game was a humdinger, and those who saw it say that it was simply a hair-raiser for thrills and tight playing. Pillmer in the box for the home boys held Dows to four hits—and the Dows team was composed of six hired men and three of the regular Dows line-up. They had the best that money could hire, and a hired pitcher from Charles City, conceded to be one of the best semi-pro pitchers in the state, and the local boys pounded him for five good solid hits.

In fielding, batting and base running, the Belmond boys more than held their own against the high-priced outfit brought against them. Even tho they lost the game they have just cause to feel proud over the showing they made.

Kanawha and Lake Mills played at the tournament Tuesday, and the Kanawhites were easy victims to the Lake Mills bunch, the latter winning 6 to 3. Belmond and Kanawha were to have played Wednesday, but on account of the rain the game was postponed. A large number of the local fans drove up to see the game and had the ride for their trouble.

DITCHED HIS TOOLS BUT SAVED THE RINDS

Livermore Gazette: Got any carpenter tools you want to sell? Mr. A. A. Snyder who works at the Catholic church is in the market for some good used tools. He visited his home at Fort Dodge over Sunday and he and his wife celebrated the occasion by carving a watermelon or two, but they evidently keep ne[illegible] and are averse to throwing melon rinds out onto the public highway after the manner of some Livermore people, so his wife suggested that he place them in a box, take them to the train, when he went to buy a ticket to Livermore, and when he was out of town a mile or two, throw them out the car window. So he endeavored to carry out her instructions; but the carpenter tools and his melon rinds were in boxes that resembled each other very much, and all too late he discovered that he had ditched the wrong box. At his earliest convenience he went back, revisited the scene of his mistaken identity, but the box of tools had disappeared, somebody having beaten him to it. We have not learned if he is still saving the melon rinds.

The Eagle Grove post of the American Legion had a big day on Tuesday of this week when members of that post and neighboring posts were taken into the mysteries of the "40 and 8". An aerial service to give exihibition flights had been engaged as part of the program, and a ball game was part of the doings of the day. A large crowd is reported as having been in attendance at the affair.

A NEW WAY TO PAY FINES

The Humboldt Republican says in its recent issue:

"It is said that a couple of still operators recently worked a smooth game on the officials. They were arrested and fined. They had sufficient funds between them to pay one of their fines. The one whose fine was paid got his release and promised to borrow money for the fine of his pal. Instead he went to his cache where his moonshine was planted and got enough to sell to take up the fine on his pal. In other words, there are more ways of killing dog than choking him on butter."

SOME GOOD IDEAS HERE

The greatest industry of the world is now started in practically every town, city, village, hamlet, and so on, it being school. And now is the time for everybody to get into harness and make it a sucess. Everybody to pull together, both young and old alike. From the little tot of five or six to the young man or woman. It is up to every parent to see that their children are in the proper place, have the proper equipment, for no industry will ever make a sucess without the equipment or the place to use same. To be in school is not the whole thing. They must have the essentials that make such a success. To illustrate, what good is a factory if they have just the building and the employees They cannot turn out a finished product without tools or material, ect., for that is half of the battle which is to be won.

Another thing that should be under strict surveillance of city or town authorites is of the older people in their actions. Motorists, tourists and truck drivers should at this time of the year give their cars and trucks a good loking over, especially the brakes of the same. At certain times of the day when hundreds of school children are turned loose after their day's work people driving cars exercise great care in driving on the streets for usually the children are apt to be careless in going home, trying to take the shortest cut, darting across street where there are no reggular crossings and the unwatchfull eye of a motorist may not see this or that child darting across the street, and the child in its hurry will not see the fast approaching car. At this time of the year, after a good seasons run, the average car is not apt to be so snappy in its movements, or so responsive to the application of the brakes, for they become worn and neglected as the season draws to a close. City authorites should put much stress on the necessity of warning drivers upon approaching school grounds to drive slowly and carefully as many young lives in the bud are in danger.—Contributed.

BILLY SUNDAY SAYS THEY'RE "FRIVOLOUS FLAPPERS"

Not the children but the parents are to blame when "flappers" run around the streets with the stockings rolled down, their forms adorned with peek-a-boo waists and short skirts, and their hair all frizzled up.

Such is the vigorous opinion entertained by the Rev. Bill Sunday and expounded at some length by him to ten thousand persons at Portland, Ore. "Any man who can look at the short-skirted, bare-necked, frizzled-headed, gum-chewing, fudge-eating modern flapper without having a moral blow-out, should get a government pension," says Billy.

Enjoyable Social Held In Pleasant Township

Farm Bureau Affair Held At Jenison Home Proves To Be Big Event

SPLENDID PROGRAM GIVEN

One of the jolliest crowds ever assembled in Pleasant township gathered at the Oscar Jenison home three miles north of Belmond Friday Sept. 29, when the members enjoyed their regular monthly farm bureau social. About three hundred farmers their wives and children turned out to enjoy an evening of entertainment and fun making.

The success of this meeting should go to Miss Vida Jenison and her corps of willing committee members who worked so faithfully in planning and organizing the program for the evening. Only those who serve on a committee of this kind realize the work and energy necessary which must be given in order to bring the people of a community together for a community gathering of this kind. The people of Pleasant township should be congratulated upon having such a splendid entertainment within the boundaries of their township line and above all, the fact that they are able to call upon their home talent and entertain themselves.

The feature of the evening's entertainment was the splendid music furnished by the Nolte Bros. harp orchestra assisted by Abe Scott. This orchestra is a good sample of the township. The boys furnished music which made the joy seekers light-hearted and lightfooted.

The following program shows the enteresting arrangement of selections which was rendered, and those who took part:

NEW CHURCH AT GOODELL TO BE DEDICATED SUNDAY

Dedication ceremonies will be held Sunday afternoon at three o'clock for the new Catholic church at Goodell, the cornerstone of the new church being laid at that time. The Rev. Dean Nolan of Eagle Grove will be in charge of the ceremonies, and an address will be delivered by Rev. F. J. Dougherty of Oelwein. Immediately following the ceremonies, the ladies of the parish will serve a bountious supper. The church is to replace the one which was burned on last Christmas day, and the fact that the members of the parish are able to lay the cornerstone of the magnificent new building so soon after the destruction of the old church speaks volumes for the progressiveness a spirit of that congregation.

HAUPT-SCHANCK

On Saturday, September 3rd, occured the marriage of Mr. Earl Lewis Haupt and Miss May Schanck, the Rev. J. H. Edge of the Methodist Episcopal church of Belmond officiating. The ceremony took place at 12:00 o'clock noon, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Geo. Schanck of Belmond.

The double ring ceremony was used, and the service took place in the presence of the immediate relatives of the couple. Those present were: Mrs. Geo. Schanck and daughter Elizabeth of Belmond, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Haupt of Belmond, Mrs. L. H. Johnson and three daughters, of Belmond. Mr. and Mrs. Alvin Haupt of Clarion Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Owens of Omaha, Nebraska

Following the ceremony a sumptuous wedding dinner was served. The bride and groom left later on a short wedding trip to points in Nebraska, and upon their return will be at home after October 1st on the groom's father's farm, southeast of Belmond.

Both young people are well and favorably known in this community and have thhe best wishes of a large circle of friends for much happiness and prosperity in their life together. The Independent joins with them in extending congratulations.

MOYOR STICKS GYPSIES FOR $25 FINE

Last Thursday morning a band of gypsies in three autos drove into town. The mayor was informed of their presence and he made a rush to drive them out. He got them all started down the street when he was informed that one woman had stolen some articles in the Liebenstein store and he had to run down and bring back the guilty party. He marched her down the street and locked her up. The man she was with begged hard for her release, but the mayor was hardhearted. He told the fellow there was a fine of $25 hanging over her that would have to be paid or he would hold her for the grand jury in October. The fellow tried every way he could to get her out without paying the money, but he had to come across. This is the first time we ever knew of any of that gang parting with money, but it was also the first time we ever saw any of them in Mayor Zeiger's clutches. They left town as soon as the woman was released.—Garner Signal.

HAMPTON MAN ORDERED TO PAY $1,000 BLACKMAIL

Chronicle: John Coggleshall, one of the old time settlers of Hamilton township, is getting in the Rockefeller class, as he recently received a "blackmail" letter demanding that he place $1,000 at a certain place, and on failure to do so the "goblins were liable to get him." things at once began to look serious—from Johns point of view, as he did not want to dig up a cool thousand, right at a time when money is tight even for a Rockefeller. Neither did he want some guy coming around and putting him on the blink.

Sheriff Atkinson and Deputy Sheriff Millett were notified, and had the case well under way, when a detective blew in from Des Moines, carried off the aforesaid blackmailing letter, and generally mussed up things by poor management. Like all detectives he wanted it to appear that he was earning his salary, even if he did not get the desired result.

The letter requested Mr. Coggeshall to go to Minneapolis & St. Louis railroad crossing, at the edge of Hampton, on McKinley street, near the W. P. Nolte home, and then go north to the third telegraph pole, and two feet north of the pole was the place designated in the letter to dig a hole and place the $1,000 in a tin can. The detective went out in broad daylight, dug the hole and placed a note in the tin can asking for futher particulars, and of course any wise guy would be on guard at the time watching for Coggeshall to come along to bury his sack of gold. When they saw the detective they knew better than to go after the money. They did not show up, altho the officials on guard picniced in the grove nearby until after midnight watching for possible developments.

"What is Threaded Rubber?"

Threaded Rubber Insulation is made up of sheets of rubber, each pierced by 196,000 tiny threads. The rubber insulates each plate from its neighbor and the threads allow the battery solution to circulate freely.

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation stays on the job month after month unaffected by acid and without a sign of splitting, cracking or perforation. It lasts as long as the battery plates and helps the battery give more miles of uninterrupted service per dollar.

You'll need a battery one of these days, so the time to get your battery information together is right now. We'll be glad to show you a Threaded Rubber Battery inside and outside and tell you why it saves you money.

IOWA PRESS ASSOCIATION

The hen since time began has been taken as a model of industriousness. She toils from dawn till dark, earnestly scratching for her daily worms wandering far and near, making her territory fit the need.

When worms are scarce and hard to find, does she sit down, bemoan her hard luck, say it's no use, there are no worms, we're all going to starve to death? She does not.

When the worms are the hardest to find them the hen extends her range and scratces all the more. She must eat, and she must have worms to eat, consequently she keeps after the worms.

Business might learn a lesson of much good and magnitude from the hen. Instead of saying that there is no business, and times are hard, and it looks like we were going to die from starvation, and what's the use, etc., the wise man would go out and, like the hen, extend his territory and scratch all the harder. One big trouble with business right now is that it has had too many worms which were too easy to get; it required very little scratcing to find all they wanted, and now that the worms are scarce and difficult to locate, some people are lying down on the job.

You won't find worms by sitting down and waiting for them to come out of their holes and be picked off; worms are too hard-headed nowadays to be easily picked up; you've got to extend your territory and scratch a little harder.

The hen who does is the hen who eats.

The man who follows suit is the one who survives.

The first ball game of the newly organized team was played here on Monday of this week when Brown's Colts came over from Clarion and trampled on them to the tune of nine to seven. It was the first game of the new team and they were somewhat ragged, but they put up a good brand of ball, nevertheless, and with an even break on things would have won. Clarion scored two in the first on a walk and a homer, Belmond tied in the second; in the third and forth the Colts piled up a total of seven runs, and in the last of the fourth Belmond tied by driving in five runs. Even Stephen until the nineth, when Clarion secured two runs of somewhat doubtful character on a line drive to right field. Belmond couldn't make the rounds in their half. It was a nice little game, well played and clean. Obrecht of Thornton pitched for the Belmond team, Wilson doing the heaving for the county seaters.

QUERIES FOR PARENTS

The boy's recent failure to pass his school examinations still rankles in the minds of his parents. They accuse him of laziness, or if they hate to acknowledge that he may be deficient in any respect, they are inclined to blame poor schooling for his failure. "His teacher did not teach him properly," they insistently assure friends. "He studied diligently enough and he is naturally quite bright, but he was not prepared as he should have been for his examinations."

Well, it is possible they are right.

There are incometent teachers, just as there are incompetent workers in every other vocation. The educational process as a whole, moreover, is not nearly as efficient as it might be. And the boy is perhaps as bright as they deem him, despite his low examination marks.

But conceding his natural brightness, it yet is entirely possible that not the teachers but the parents are mostly to blame for his examination failure. Has this possibility received any thought from them? If not I command to their consideration some queries recently put to parents in a questionaire issued from a Toronto school. Here they are:

"Do you visit the school to inquire about your child's process and deportment, and to see if you can help the teacher to help the child.

"Do you encourage your child in respect for teachers and for others in authority?

"Do you send your child to bed in time, so that he will be fit for study?

"Do you provide plain nourishing food and see that your child is up in time to eat a good breakfast?

"Do you teach your child to read the papers and find out the best in them, and do you encourage an interest in public affairs?

"Do you advoid gossip before your children and the telling of incidents which they may misinterpret?

"Do you encourage helpful conversation at table?

"Do you interest yourself in your child's sports, amusements and friendships?

"Do you comply with the rules of public health in your home?

"And do you keep in mind the fact that, while the school may be made to instill right principles, your children are handicapped if you do not support the school by instilling obedience and high ideals of patriotism and personal life?

Unless you can satisfactorily answer these queries, it is hardly in order for you hastily to condemn either your unfortunate little boy or his teachers for something which actually may be your fault more than his or theirs.

And if candor compels you to give unsatisfactory answers, then I would respectfuly suggest that, wherever you find your policy as a parent at fault, you should endeavor to make the necessary correction.

The results to your boy may be so beneficial that, long before his school life is done, you will be as proud of him as now you are irritated and discouraged.—Published by request.

The wool growers of Wright county met at the county agent's office Saturday afternoon, Sept. 3, and organized the Wright County Wool Growers Association. The purpose of this organization will be to look after the interests of all wool grower of the county and see that proper returns are made for wool consignors. The following men were elected as officers of the organization: Pres. M L. Clark, vice pres. Clark McNeal, sec.-treas. Ralph P. Smith.

A membership fee of twenty-five cents was decided upon as a reasonable fee necessary to carry on the business of the organization. All wool growers are urged to sign up by sending membership fee to R. P. Smith sec.-treas., of the organization.

LINCOLN GIRLS ORGANIZE

The girls of Lincoln township met at the home of Mrs Anna Overbaugh Saturday afternoon, Sept. 3, and with the assistance of Miss Hazel Spencer county club leader, and the county agent, organized a girl's club with Mrs. Isel Matsen as club leader for the township and with Edith Waddel president, Edna Pohlman vice president, Margery Soults sec.-treas., and Madelyn Russell club reporter.

The next meeting of this club will be announced later by the club leader. The matter of deciding upon a name for the club and other business will come up at the next regular meeting of the club.

CLUB GIRLS WIN AT THE STATE FAIR

Entries were made in the garment club department by several Wright county girls and two of the girls succeeded in winning in their classes.

Entry was made in class 204 (Suit able dress for tall, slender school girl) by Ruth Dorr, age 19, of Grant township, who won fourth place out of a total of seven places in this department. It is interesting to note that this girl was the youngest to enter in this particular class, because all other girls who entered ranged in age from 12 to 16. Entry was made in class 209 (Set of three piece underwear) by Blanche Sibert, age 16, of Grant township, who won fifth place out of seven placings in this particular class.

A new feature of the club work in the state is the foundation of a state organization which has for its object the organzation of the club pigs for the 1922 season. This organization consists of three representatiyes from each county within the state. The Misses Mary Denby, Blanche Flurer and Lorene Porter were selected to represent Wright county on this committee for next year's fair exhibit Miss Hazel Spencer, county leader of girls' club work, will act as senior advisor.

The Wright county girls' club has the distinction of being the only organizaton in the state which has a definite program for the entire year. The credit for the success of the girls' club work in Wright county should go to Miss Hazel Spencer, who volunteered her services as county club leader and who has worked so faithfully and untiringly in an effort to put club work on the map in Wright county and in the state.

The girls' clubs of the state were entertained royally while at the fair. They were entertained at the Successful Farming Publishing company, they enjoyed a three-course luncheon at the Yonkers Bros. department store on the same day. They were entertaind Wednesday afternoon at the afternoon program in the amphitheatre and at the evening program in the same place as guests of the Iowa State College and the club leaders of the state. All club boys and girls were entertained Tuesday at the girls and' women's community house by Miss Josephine Arnquist, state leader of girls' club work and Paul Taff and Mr. Reed, state leaders of boys' club work.

CLOTHING SPECIALIST IN WRIGHT COUNTY

Miss Cora Leiby, of the extension department, is conducting a series of "dress form" demonstrations in Wright county this week. The schedule has been arranged so as to include the townships which asked for this work in their program of work and to invite the neighboring townships so as to give them an opportunity to attend.

The demonstrations as they are being conducted by Miss Leiby consist of all day meetings. The forenoon meeting is given to fitting the dress form to one lady of the group and allowing the dress form to dry during the dinner hour. The afternoon demonstration consists of an explanation of how the dress form is cut and reassembled. The demonstrations are proving very interesting and instructive and it is thought that the ladies of the county are getting as much good from this particular line of work as anything else that has been put on.

IOWA LAND TAXES TOO HIGH

For the first time, in the history of Iowa the farmers have been represented before the executive council in connection with the equalization of taxes. The railroads have always been represented and it is a common belief that they have been assessed a lower ratio, in fact the farm bureau federation presented figures before the executive council showing that railroads and other interests who have made a practice of having representation before the council have been assessed a less relative ratio than has farm property.

The farm bureau presented figures to show that farm land was assessed higher on its valuation and net income and carried a greater share of the taxes. It is general knowledge that the railroads have spent a large amount of their time in compiling figures to show that Iowa land has increased in selling value.

This office has received a large amount of material put out by the railroad office from Cedar Rapids showing in detail the increase in value of land in each township. They have hoped with these figures to have farm land bear a larger per cent of the taxes than it already carries. The figures went on to show that land had increased over forty per cent in the last two years. The Iowa Farm Bureau Federation may be given credit for having averted this increase in valuation of farm land.

It is conceded fact that Iowa farm lands today are taxed over 25 per cent of their net income, taking the last ten years as an average. The federation is to be commended for their good work Let us back them for other pieces of work of similar nature that will be of benefit to us.

SEVERAL HOG CHOLERA OUTBREAKS IN DAKOTA

The existance of several outbreaks of hog cholera in South Dakota is reported by Dr. G. S. Weaver extension specialist in animal diseases at the state college. The disease, he says, is istributed mainly over the eastern part of the state. Many cases have been reported where the disease has wiped out most of the animals in the herd.

"Hog cholera," says Dr. Weaver, is caused by a very small germ, and this germ will live many months if covered up in a cold, dark, damp place. The disease occurs in several forms and does not always act the same. Some hogs die quickly while others linger longer.

"At this time of the year hog cholera is more prevailant than in winter or spring. The disease can be prevented by vaccination, coupled with sanitation. All hogs in the neighborhood of hog cholera should be immediately vaccinated; visiting of hog lots should be immediately stopped; all dogs should be tied up; dead animals should be immediately buried Vaccination should be done before the animals get sick, as it is a preventative measure and not a cure."

BURT FARMER HAS OVER HUNDRED HOGS STOLEN

Officials at Burt are hunting a thief or a gang of thieves, who were smooth enough to steal one hundred and seventeen hogs from the farm of W. E. Grover and never wake the farmer or any of his family.

It is thought that the swine were driven from the farm and then loaded into trucks. This is the largest haul of livestock that has been reported in a long time, and the smoothness of the crooks is remarkable.

No Subsitute Offered.

Say what you will about druggists offering something "just as good" because it pays a better profit, the fact still stands that ninety-nine out of a hundred druggists recommend Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy, when the best medicine for diarrhoea is asked for, and do so because they know from what their customers say of it, that it can be depended upon.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

GENERAL LIVESTOCK MOVEMENT DECREASES

Government figures recently released show that the total live stock receipts of 69 public stockyards decreased decidedly during the first seven months of this year as compared to a corresponding period in 1920. The only exception are the sheep receipts, which increased 11.8 percent. The movement of cattle showed a decrease of 13 percent, and hogs 5.5 percent for the same periods.

Of the 69 markets, Chicago was the only one of the few to show an increase, which was due entirely to the unusually large runs of sheep this year. The increase amounted to 1.5 percent. On the other hand, South St. Paul was one of the large markets to show a heavy decrease which amounted to 17.3 percent.

NEBRASKA CO-OPERATIVE ORGANIZATIONS SHOW PROFITS

A study just completed by the Nebraska state department of agriculture shows that there are many successful co-operative enterprises in that state. Farmers there are successfully conducting the business of 244 elevators, 46 elevators and lumber yards combined, 39 stores and elevators, 6 elevators, stores and lumber yards combined, 5 implement houses, 13 creameries, 114 stores and 2 telephone companies. There are in addition to a considerable number of other enterprises of similar nature, largely elevators, owned by stock companies made up entirely of famers. The companies have been trying an average of 8 percent dividends and have a little over $5,000,000 invested.

SILOS WILL BE FILLED EARLIER THIS YEAR

Silos will be filled earlier than usual this year, due to the advanced season. Care must be taken that the corn does not get too dry nor too mature before filling. For best results the corn should be nearly all in the dent stageg and the stalk should contain a great deal of moisture. If this moisture is lacking, the only alternative is to supply fater as the silo is being filled. This can be done quite conveniently by running a stream of water thru a hose or pipe into the drum of the blower.

It is surprising what a large quantity of water dry fodder will absorb. A three-fourths inch pipe carrying a steady stream of water is oftentimes none too large.

Good silage makes a cheap, palatable and succulent feed out of coarse corn fodder. Ot uses all of the corn plant and furnishes the very best substitute for grass thru all the winter months. Care should be taken to see that the silo is filled properly. With ordinary good care it is the best paying investment on the farm

ACREAGE OF WINTER GRAINS TO BE INCREASED THIS FALL

An increased acreage of winter grains will be planted in South Dakota this fall, judging from the inquiries received by the extension service of that state, where many letters have been answered regarding the culture of these crops and the sources of good seed.

A fall seed list has been issued by the South Dakota Experiment association, an organization of pure seed growers, with the co-operation of the county agents and the extension service from whom copies can be obtained.

This list is the result of the certified seed work of the state college and the information which it contains is valuable to the grower who wants to secure good seed of the best varieties, such as Turkey and Kanred winter wheats; Swedish, Advance and Rosen winter rye.

EMMETSBURG DEPOT IS ROBBED BY THIEVES

Emmetsburg Democrat: Sunday night burglars entered the Milwaukee depot an took between $80 and $90 from the safe. They also broke into the trunk in the freight room but so far as we have leaned they did not secure anything of value. They entered thru the freight room and cut out some wood-work in order to get into the ticket office. The operator who was on duty Sunday evening turned the combination of the safe a short distance and instucted the operator who came early in the morning how to turn it back and open it as he did not know the combination. After unlocking the safe, the thief closed it again and the operator could not open it. Local parties are suspected and will doubtless be hunted down. As the Democrat has stated from time to time, some of our young men are criminally inclined will soon find their way into penetentiaries.

TYPHOID PATIENT FOUND DROWNED IN WATER TANK

Harold Sorenson, a young farmer who had been working for Juhl Bros., down on the J. J. Cosgrove half section farm was found in Will Cosgrove's water tank early in the morning with his head and shoulders in the tank and the balance of his body on the outside. The history of his case is about as follows: Last Sunday Harold called on Dr. Sartor and complained that he was not feeling well. The doctor gave him some medicine and he went home. Monday he grew worse and Dr. Sartor was called. His ailment developed into typhoid fever and a nurse was sent for and arrived Tuesday. At 10:30 on Tuesday night his fever was 102 and pulse 88. At ten minutes till three yesterday morning the nurse heard a movement in the room and she woke up quickly, and by the time she got up from her cot the sick man jumped thru the window and ran away. She immeidately called the Juhl Bros. and their sisters. A search was made for the young man first by looking around the farm and then by horse back. Neighbors were called out. But no clew as to where he went was obtained by daylight when Will Cosgrove found the body partly in his water tank located east of his barn. The coroner was called yesterday morning. The young man was born in Denmark and had only been in this country a short time. He was delirious when he jumped thru the window and ran away, of course, and the cause of his death was not from drowning, but perhaps by the rush of blood to his head when he stooped for a drink from the water tank.—Titonka Topic.

HAMPTON TO BUY A REAL FIRE ENGINE

Chronicle: The city council last week purchased a real fire engine, one similar to the fire truck and engine which was demonstrated in Hampton several weeks ago. At that time the engine pumped water and threw it over the court house and as high as the dome. The truck and engine cost $6,000.

The new fire truck and engine will give Hampton a fire equipment that few towns of its size can boast of. With the modern chemical fire truck purchased a couple years ago, this new equipment will give the town ample fire protecton, if there is any water to be had in case of fire. It will surely pump the water and no worry will be necessary hereafter about the water pressure. All that will be necessary is plenty of water. The new truck and engine will be here within a week or ten days and will be given a ten-day tryout before final settlement is made.

GREAT CHURCHMAN PASSES AWAY AT SIOUX CITY

Bishop W. S. Lewis, one of the most popular bishops of the Methodist church, passed away at Sioux City last week, death being caused by an infection on the back of his neck, which spread until it developed into several severe boils.

Bishop Lewis was known by many of the Methodists of this community. For a number of years he was a member of the Upper Iowa Conference. He was president of the Epworth Seminary for several years and was president later of Morningside College, where his influence and work helped to make that institution one of the foremost denominational schools in the country.

He was elected bishop at the Methodist general conference held in 1908 at Baltimore. There were severa leaders of the Methodist church who were brought forward by their friends for the position. A number of ballots were taken and Mr. Lewis was among those who received liberal support. At one time he insisted on his friends withdrawing his name from the contest and his friends agreed that if would be impossible to elect him at that time. However, others insisted that his name remain and it was agreed that Mr. Lewis should stay in the contest. After a few more ballots it was seen that he was going to win and the entire delegation from Iowa boosted strongly. Shortly after that the final ballot was taken which elected Mr. Lewis. Following his election he was stationed for a time in China and he had served all the time since in that country.

A Pronounced Success

The unform success that has attended the use of Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy in the relief and cure of bowel complaints, both children and adults, has brought it to almost universal use, so that it is practically without a rival and as everyone who has used it knows, it is without an equal.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

CHAPTER I.

David Moreland's Mountain.

Carlyle Wilburton Dale—known to himself and a few close friends as Bill Dale—had laid out a course of action almost before the northbound train had left the outskirts of the state capital behind. It incurred facing big odds; but other men had faced big odds and won out, and what others had done he could do. Indeed, he had already done several things which other men might not have thought of doing, and one of them was leaving a bride, not figuratively but literally, at the altar in a fashionable church! But he knew Patricia hadn't wanted to marry him any more than he had wanted to marry her.

It was only natural for him to think of coal, now that he had cut loose for all time from the "set" in which he had always been a colossal misfit, now that he must pull his own oars or virtually perish. He had heard coal talked since the day of his birth; to him coal and business meant exactly the same.

One of his father's associates had often spoken of a fine vein in the mountains of eastern Tennessee—had often tried to persuade his father to look into it, to no avail. Young Dale remembered that this vein lay not far from a long railroad siding called the Halfway Switch, in the vicinity of Big Pine mountain. The owners were mountain folk of English descent, his father's associate had said. Decidedly strange, thought Dale, that his father had never cared to investigate it.

The cindery little train reached the long siding about the middle of a fine spring morning. Dale took up his bag, hastened out, and soon found himself standing alone in the heart of an extremely wild section of country.

When the noises of the little train and the fast mail it had just met had died away, there came the saucy chattering of boomer-squirrels and the sweet twittering of birds. Dale caught the joyous spirit. He could have fairly shouted out of the fullness of his very human heart. Here all was unspoiled and unprofaned, and something whispered within him:

"They won't call you a savage here—make this your own country!"

From somewhere on a nearby mountainside a rifle's keen report split the air; a bullet whined like a mad hornet; Dale's hat jumped a little on his head.

The awakening was exceedingly rude. Dale wheeled, his gray eyes ablaze, and saw only a tiny cloud of smoke-mist rising from the laurels more than fifty feet away.

"Come out, you coward!" he roared. "Come out and let me see you," curiosity taking the place of anger in his voice. "I've always wanted to know just what a real highwayman was like!"

The muffled sound of a twig breaking a short distance off to his left next claimed his attention. He was being closely watched by a pair of the finest, clearest brown eyes he had ever seen. He saw her eyes first; he never forgot that.

She was standing on a low cliff beyond the sparkling creek that flowed beside the railroad, and she was partially hidden by a clump of blooming laurel. But Dale could see that she was about twenty; that every line of her rounded, graceful figure whispered of a doelike strength; that she was as straight as a young pine; that her chestnut-brown hair caught the sunlight, and that her face was oval-shaped and handsome—rather than pretty—in spite of its tan.

Dale took off his hat. There was a bullet hole in the very top of its high-peaked crown.

"Who's the robber?" he frowned.

The girl blushed.

"Mebbe he ain't a robber," she said. "Mebbe he thought you was somebody else. Anyhow, you ain't bad hurt, are ye?"

Dale smiled. "Oh, not seriously!"

"You ain't likely to be, ef ye behave yeself."

"If I behave myself—!" Dale laughed. "Why, I couldn't be naughty if I tried; I'm the one and only mamma's little Willie-boy! I wonder if I could put up at some house near here; eh?"

"The' might be," she said, thoughtfully.

"Where?"

"At pap's, or grandpap's, or with most any o' my people; or," she added with a contemptuous twist to her lips, "you might stay with some o' them low-down Morelands."

"Where do your people live?"

"About six mile back that way." She pointed over her shoulder with a forefinger.

"Would you mind showing me the way to your parental domicile?"

"What's that, fo goodness sake?"

"Your home, you know," Dale explained with a smile.

"Oh, my home. Why didn't ye say so, then? No, I won't," she declared.

Dale put his bag down and rested his hands on his hips.

"Why, may I inquire?"

"'Cause I won't. I don't never keep comp'ny with no strange menfolks. But yander comes By, and he'll show ye the way; he's a-goin' over to the settlement."

Dale faced to the right and saw, coming toward him with steps that would have measured almost four feet, the tallest and lankiest individual he had ever seen outside a circus. The newcomer had a smoothly shaven chin, his coal-black hair was long and his long mustache completely hid the narrow slit that was his mouth. In one hand he carried a repeating rifle.

"Who's that?" Dale half whispered.

"That's By Heck," answered the girl. She continued in a low voice, "His name's Sam Heck; but pap, he called him 'By Heck' one day, and the nickname stuck to him like molasses. Everybody calls him that now, even the revenuers. By, he's the biggest eater, and the biggest liar, in the world! But his lyin' don't never do no harm, and nobody keers. So ef ye want to go to the settlement, mister, By, he'll take ye over. They mebbe ain't got what you're used to fo' eatin', but ye'll be welcome to what the' is."

She laughed a little, turned, and disappeared among the blooming laurels.

The man By Heck wore the poor clothing of a poor hillman. His hat, which had once been black, was all brim and yet all crown; his suspenders, which had been bought with a 'coonhide, were redder than fire; his rundown cowhide boots seemed ridiculously short because of the great length of his slender legs.

"'Cause I Won't. I Don't Never Keep Comp'ny With No Strange Menfolks."

When he had reached a point some three yards from Dale, he halted, placed the butt of his rifle carefully between his toes, and leaned on its muzzle; then he deliberately began to take eye measurements of the newcomer.

Dale didn't like the stare—to him it was impudent.

"Well, what's the verdict?" he asked sharply.

"Spoke like a man," drawled By Heck. "I reckon you must be up here a-lookin' fo' coal."

"How did you reach such a conclusion as that?"

"Jest plain hoss sense." The drooping mustache muffled the words somewhat. "The' ain't but three things 'at can bring a city man here, mister," he drawled on, "and them's moonshine stills, bad health, and coal. You shore ain't got bad health, and you ain't got the cut of a revenuer, though a few minutes ago I thought mebbe ye was."

"And you shot at me!" said Dale.

"No," objected Heck. "I shot at yore hat. I allus hits at what I shoots at, mister. I wanted ye to turn yore face, so's I could see it, and ye did. As fo' that coal—

"The Morelands, they owns the coal in David Moreland's mountain, and they won't sell it fo' no 'mount o' money. They lives over in the settlement, them and the Littlefords. They're every danged one fine folks. I'm a-goin' over thar now. Want to go long? Say—dang my picture ef I didn't fo'git to ax what might be yore name, mister!"

"Bill Dale," came quickly—"Bill Dale. Settlement? Sure! Lead the way, By Heck. Who's the young woman I was talking with when you came up?"

"Who? Her? That's old Ben Littleford's gyurl. Her name's Babe. That's what they call her. She's got another name; but it ain't been used fo' so long it's been fo'got, I reckon. She's the youngest one o' old Ben's children. She hain't like none o' the rest o' the Littlefords. By gosh, she's awful high headed. She can read good, Babe can. Old Major Bradley, from down at Cartersville in the lowland, he spends his summers up here fo' his health, and he teached Babe how to read. Fine feller, Major Bradley. Lawyer. Babe, she has done read everything in the whole danged country. The's sev'ral Bibles, and a book about a Pilgrim's Prog-ress, and a Baker's Hoss and Cattle Almaneck, and a dic-dictionary.

"But we'd better light out fo' the settlement, Mr. Bill, or we'll miss dinner, mebbe. I'm a plumb danged fool about eatin'. I e't twenty-two biscuits o' flour-bread this mornin' fo' breakfus', asides a whole b'iled hamshank, and other things accordin'. It's the dyin truth! Come on, Mr. Bill."

They went down to the creek, crossed it on stones, and began to climb the low cliff.

After an hour's traveling Heck stopped in the trail and put the butt of his rifle to the ground.

"From right here, Bill," he said, "we can see every house in the whole danged settlement."

They were standing on the crest of David Moreland's mountain. Below them lay a broad valley checkered with small farms; and each farm had its log cabin, its log barn and its apple orchard. Beyond it all rose the great and majestic Big Pine, which was higher and more rugged with cliffs than David Moreland's mountain.

"The Morelands lives on this side o' the river, and the Littlefords lives on yan side," drawled Heck. "They don't never have nothing to do with each other, but they don't hardly ever fight; they're all strappin' big men, and they fights so danged hard it don't pay. My gosh, Bill, every man of 'em can shoot a gnat's eyelash off at four hundred yards—I wisht I may drap dead ef they cain't! Do ye see that big cabin right plumb in the middle o' the nigh half o' the settlement, Bill? Well, the boss o' the Morelands he lives thar—John Moreland. That's whar you want to go, Bill, sence ye've got a oncyorable case o' the disease knowed as coal-on-the-brain. But I can tell ye aforehand, you ain't got enough money to buy that coal, don't matter how much money ye've got."

Dale was not looking toward John Moreland's home now. His gaze had wandered to the other side of the river. By Heck waited a full minute for a reply to his speech, then he spoke again:

"The gyurl, or the coal—is that what's a-botherin' ye, Bill?"

Dale's eyes twinkled. "Must I choose between them?" he laughed.

"Shore!" By Heck wasn't even smiling. "Shore! The Morelands and Littlefords hates each other wuss nor a blue-tailed hawk hates a crow. The gyurl, or the coal, Bill?"

"We'll go down to John Moreland's," announced Dale.

The mountaineer took up his rifle. "Let me gi' ye a word or two o' warnin'," he continued seriously. "Don't you offer to pay John Moreland fo' eatin' his grub, nor fo' sleepin' in his bed, nor fo' chawin' his tobacker. Ef ye do, yore goose will shore be cooked with John Moreland. But ef ye was to brag on the vittles a little, John's wife a-bein pow'ful handy in the kitchen, it wouldn't do a danged bit o' harm. Do ye understand it all now, Bill?"

Dale nodded, and they began the descent.

John Moreland's house was built of whole oak logs, which were chinked with oak splits and daubed in between with clay; the roof was of handmade boards, and a chimney of stones and clay rose at either end.

John Moreland himself sat on the front porch, and beside him lay a repeating rifle, two young squirrels that had been very neatly shot through the head, and a weary black-and-tan hound. He was an uncommonly big man, and about forty-seven; his eyes were gray and keen; his thick hair and full beard were a rich brown, with only a few threads of white. There was a certain English fineness about the man. One felt that he could trust John Moreland.

As the moonshiner and his companion reached the gate Moreland rose and pushed his hat back from his forehead.

"Hi, John," grinned Heck. "This here feller wants to stay with ye a few days, John. Seems to be all right."

"Come right in," invited the chief of the Morelands. He indicated the home-made chair he had just vacated. "Set down thar and rest, stranger. I'll be back in a minute or so."

He h[illegible] into the cabin, carrying the squ[illegible] with him.

"He's went to tell his wife to hatch up a extry good dinner, Bill," whispered Heck. "Pepper-cyored ham, young chicken, hot biscuits, fresh butter, wild honey, huckleberry pie and peach pie and strawberry presarves—Bill, I cain't hardly stand it. Blast my picture ef I couldn't eat two whole raw dawgs right now, I'm that dingbusted hongry. Well, I got to ramble on home. I live down the river half a mile, we and my maw. Come to see me, Bill, and we'll go a-fishin'. So long, Bill old boy!"

John Moreland returned presently. The man from the city rose and proffered his hand.

"My name," he began, old habit strong upon him, "is Carlyle—"

Before he could get any farther with it John Moreland flung the hand from him as though it were a thing of unspeakable contamination. His bearded face went deathly white with the whiteness of an old and bitter hatred. His great fists clenched, and every muscle in his giant body trembled.

"What's the matter, man?" Dale wanted to know.

"Carlyle!" Moreland repeated in a hoarse growl. "You say yore name is Carlyle!"

"Carlyle!" Moreland Repeated in a Hoarse Growl. "You Say Yore Name Is Carlyle!"

"Yes," wonderingly, "but that's only a part of it. My name is Carlyle Wilburton Dale—Bill Dale. What's the matter?"

"Did you come from West Virginny?" sharply.

Dale gave the name of his home town and state.

"That's dif'rent." The mountaineer's countenance became lighter. "This man I'm a-thinkin' about, he was from West Virginny. I hope you won't hold nothin' ag'in me fo' actin' up that away. I couldn't he'p it, shore, it seems. You'll know how I felt when I tell ye about it, Mr. Dale. I owe it to ye to explain. Jest a minute—"

He stepped into the cabin and brought out another chair, sat down heavily and crossed his legs. Dale, too, sat down.

"The mountain you had to come over to come here, Mr. Dale," Moreland began, his big voice filled with an old, old sorrow, "is knowed as David Moreland's mountain mostly because David Moreland is buried in the very highest place on top of it, him and his wife. He was my brother, and was the best brother a man ever had. It was allus the talk o' the neighborhood how much we liked each other. Up ontel the time he was married I went with him whar he went, and he went with me whar I went. I'd fight fo' him, and he'd fight fo' me. It's hard to tell, even atter this long time. . . .

"David, he was a strappin' big man, like all o' the Morelands. He was about yore size, and grey-eyed like you, and he had brown hair like you. When you walked up to the gate, it made me think o' him the day he was married; he was all dressed up in dark blue like you. . . . Then David he went up here one summer and found this vein o' coal. He got lawful p'session o' the mountain, and moved his wife up here. The rest of us lived over in the Laurel Fork country then.

"One day I got a letter from David, which said that a man named John K. Carlyle was a-goin' to buy his mountain and the coal, and said that his wife was pow'ful sick. A week later she died, and left a baby which died, too, accordin' to a old Injun by the name o' Cherokee Joe, who knowed my pap and knowed David. And a month later we was all dragged from our beds by this same Cherokee Joe, tellin' us that Carlyle had shot David. Carlyle, Cherokee Joe said, was a-drinkin' hard. The Injun seed the shootin' through a window.

"It was might' nigh to three days later when we got here and found pore David a-layin' whar he'd fell. We scoured the mountains fo' miles and miles around in a s'arch fo' the dawg who killed him, but we never found him. . . . The land up here looked purty, and it belonged to us by David's death; so we all moved up here to live, and built us cabins.

"Major Bradley found out about the end o' my brother, and he wanted us to put the case in the hands o' the law. But we wouldn't do it. A Moreland never goes to law about anything. He pays his own debts, and he collects what is his due—"

John Moreland arose and paced the porch floor, which creaked under his weight. He stopped before Dale, and went on sadly:

"Now ye'll know why I was so much tore up when I heered yore name, the Carlyle part. John K. Carlyle killed the best man 'at ever lived. And mebbe ye'll onderstand why we ain't never had the conscience to sell the coal, which cost Brother David his life."

Moreland's guest sat staring absently toward a brown-winged butterfly that was industriously sipping honey from the heart of a honeysuckle bloom. He gave no sign that he had heard anything out of the ordinary, but in an odd, persistent way his mind seemed to connect his father, John K. Dale, with the story he had just heard.

John K. Dale had come originally from West Virginia, and he had flatly refused, time upon time, to make any investigation of the Moreland coal property.

The hillman interrupted young Dale's thinking:

"Addie, she's a-goin' to have dinner ready purty soon. Would ye like to wash, Mr. Dale?"

"Yes," was the answer, and in the tones of Bill Dale's quiet voice there was a shade of meaning that Moreland did not catch. "Yes, I'd like to wash."

CHAPTER II

In the Cup.

Dale found the humble home of his mountaineer host a home in the fullest sense of the word.

At the noonday meal, he met Mrs. Moreland and the sons of the household, and they were exactly as he had pictured them. Mrs. Moreland was quiet, motherly, always smiling, as straight and real as her husband. The sons, Caleb and Luke, were as much alike as the fingers on your hands; they were tall and broad-shouldered, grey-eyed and brown-haired.

Before sundown Dale had become acquainted with the rest of the Morelands, and he liked them, every one. He was at the cabin of his host's gray old father and mother for a long time.

When supper was over John Moreland lighted the big glass lamp in the best room, and the family and their guest gathered there to spend the evening. Then the lanky moonshiner and his mother came in.

Granny Heck had the sharp features and the stooped, thin figure of a witch. She wore a faded blue bandana about her white head, and she carried a long hickory staff; there was a reed-stemmed clay pipe in her mouth, and her dark calico skirt had a tobacco pocket in it.

Her son preceded her into the room. He walked to the center table, faced about, and said with a low and airy sweep of his right hand:

"Bill, old boy, this here's maw. Maw, she tells forchunes."

"So this here," creaked Granny Heck, looking over the brass rims of her spectacles, "is Mr. Bill! Well, well! I jest thought to myself 'at I'd come up and see ye, Mr. Bill, and tell yore forchune."

She dropped into the rocker that Caleb had placed for her.

"Addie," she said to the smiling Mrs. Moreland, "will ye bring me a cup half full o' coffee grounds?"

When the cup came, the fortuneteller took it and shook it and patted it, all the while muttering mysterious words that she had learned from the old Indian, Cherokee Joe—which served her purpose very well.

"I see," she mumbled more or less sepulchrally, "a pow'ful good-lookin' gyurl in a caliker dress, with her hair a-hangin' away down her back. A barefooted gyurl, with big, purty eyes. She's a-standin' on a low clift, a-peepin' at you through the laurels, Mr. Bill. This is in the past. . . .

"In the future," she went on slowly, "I see this here as plain as daylight through a knothole; a awful big man, with curly black hair and curly black beard, and with eyes like a clift-hawk's; and I see you, too, Mr. Bill; and I see a fight, a master fight—Lord ha' mussy, what a fight! But you'll marry the gyurl after all, Mr. Bill."

Dale laughed. The old woman had described Babe Littleford. But who was the "big, dark man"? Some fellow who had lost his heart to the mountain girl, perhaps.

When the Hecks had gone, John Moreland leaned forward and touched his guest on the knee.

"That thar big man mentioned in tellin' yore forchune," he said, "might ha' been Black Adam Ball. Black Adam, he lives with his pap and mother a few mile up the river. As big as a skinned hoss, he is, and plumb ongodly strong. He's been a-beggin' Babe Littleford to marry him fo' a year or two, and she won't listen to him.

"Ef ever ye do haf to fight Black Adam," John Moreland went on, "ye want to fight him with a two-eyed shotgun and buckshot. He's the meanest man on earth; snake-broth and pizen vine is religious aside o' him. But ontel ye begin a-makin' love to Babe Littleford, I reckon the' ain't no danger o' you a-havin' trouble with Black Adam; and you ain't likely, I take it, to make love to Babe."

"But Babe's the best one o' the Littlefords," declared Luke.

John Moreland reached for the leatherbound old family Bible. He opened the Book at random.

"It's about time we was a-goin' to our rest, and we'll go jest as soon as we've had prayers, Mr. Dale."

When half a chapter from St. Matthew had been laboriously but reverently read, the Morelands knelt at their chairs, and so did Bill Dale. John Moreland's bedtime prayer was very simple, and very earnest, and it had in it more of thanksgiving than of supplication. And a part of it certainly was uncommon—

"Bless the stranger with us here tonight, and all o' our kinfolks, and all o' our friends, and our inimies, the Littlefords—'specially the Littlefords. Aymen!"

Dale was deeply impressed. He heard Mrs. Moreland dimly when she told him to let her know—she would hear him if he called—if there wasn't enough cover for his bed. Then he found himself alone with the stalwart chief of the Morelands.

He stepped forward and put his hand on the mountaineer's shoulder.

"How a man can go down on his knees and pray for his enemies," smiled Dale, "is entirely beyond me. Do you really mean it?"

"I try hard to," Moreland said quickly. "In a-doin' that," he went on, "I go Ben Littleford one better. Ben Littleford's the bell sheep o' the people who lives acrost the river from us, people we've hated fo' years and years. Ben, he holds fambly prayers, too, every night. He'd ax the blessin' o' the Lord on the stranger onder his roof, but not on his inimies, the Morelands. Yes, I try hard to mean it, Bill Dale."

"And that other enemy," murmured Dale—and he wondered why that should bother him so much, why he should feel that vague responsibility about it—"the man who killed your brother, David—"

"I don't never pray fo' him," interrupted the mountaineer, going a little pale. "I hain't that nigh juffect. A man don't git so good 'at he axes the Almighty to bless the devil—or the rattler in the laurels, or the copperhead 'at waits onder a bush fo' the passin' o' some bare-legged child."

Dale winced, but Moreland didn't notice it. Dale let his hand fall from the other's shoulder. Moreland began to speak again:

"I didn't tell ye afore, Bill Dale. My brother David, he was the hope o' his people. He was better'n the rest of us. The one big aim o' his life was to educate us all, the benighted. Yes, we're benighted, and we know it. He meant to do it with the coal he'd found. As I've done told ye, we ain't never had the heart to sell the coal. I hope ye'll have a fine rest, Bill Dale. I ain't a-goin' to call ye 'Mister' no more, Bill Dale!"

"Don't!" smilingly said the younger man. "'Bill Dale' is right, y'know. Good-night, John Moreland!"

Dale removed his shoes and outer clothing, blew out the light, and went to bed in the best room's hand-carved black walnut fourposter.

For a long time he lay there awake, and stared through a little window toward a bright star that burned like a beacon fire about the pine-fringed crest of David Moreland's mountain. He believed he understood now why his father had turned a greenish gray when this coal property was mentioned to him. He believed he understood why his father had flatly refused to investigate this vein. But he was wholly at a loss to account for the use of his own given name instead of Dale.

Looking toward the mountain again, he spoke as though he were talking to David Moreland himself:

"I'll see it through for you, old man. This shall be my country."

CHAPTER III

Goliath of the Hills.

Dale awoke a little after daybreak, arose and dressed himself, and went out by way of the door beside the huge stone-and-clay chimney.

The mountain air was bracing. Dale threw out his chest and started eagerly for a walk.

The road led past the cabin of Grandpap Moreland. When Dale was directly in front of the log house, he saw the aged mountaineer standing on a rickety sawhorse beside the stone step at the narrow porch; Grandpap Moreland was helping a gray cat down from the roof.

"Mornin'! I was jest a-takin' that thar cussfired old pest down offen the roof. I've took him down every mornin' as reg'lar as I make fires, fo' three year or more. Ef it wasn't bad luck to kill a cat, I' shoot him, mebbe."

After breakfasting with John Moreland, Bill Dale borrowed fishing-tackle from his host, and set out alone for the little river.

There were many shoals and rapids, and he went almost half a mile before he found a place to his liking. It was a beautiful spot. Above, the water poured between two great boulders with a gentle roar; below, it shallowed out over round stones. Overhead towered tall white sycamores.

Not until he had put a minnow on the hook and cast it out did he see that he was not alone at the pool. On the other side, less than sixty feet away, Babe Littleford sat on a stone the size of a small barrel; she held a cane fishing-rod in her hands, and her bare feet were in the water to her ankles. She was looking squarely toward Dale, and there was something akin to reproachful anger in her long brown eyes.

"Good morning!" called Dale, lifting his hat.

There was no reply. There was not even a change of countenance. Again Dale called his friendly greeting, and again there was no reply. It piqued Dale.

A few yards down the stream the white body of a sycamore lay from one bank to the other; it had been blown there by a recent storm. Dale wound his line, went down and crossed by means of the prostrate tree.

She didn't even look around when he walked up to her and spoke again. It struck him as being decidedly odd.

"I say," he told her, "you're as chatty as a set of stencils. You mustn't talk so much, y'know."

Her eyes smiled at the river, but Dale couldn't see her eyes.

"Do you like violets, Miss Littleford?" he asked next.

In the black, mica-starred soil at his feet grew a carpet of the finest violets he had ever seen. Babe let the tip of her cane rod fall into the water and looked around.

"It sounds funny to hear a man talk o' sech little things as vi'lets," she declared. "Most o' men don't think o' nothin' but workin', huntin', fightin'

LOCAL BOY FATALLY INJURED IN ACCIDENT

Enrollment In High School Is Record Breaker

School Opened With Largest Number Of High School Students In History

ADD ONE MORE TEACHER

School opened with the largest enrollment in high school in the history of the school. There are enrolled 141 pupils in high school. There are 55 in the Freshman class. Just imagine what a fine graduating class that would be, should they all stay in high school.

Agnes Dillon substituted for Miss Ramsey in first grade Tuesday.

An extra teacher was added to the teaching force Monday, as the enrollment was so large in the grades. Miss Sadie Frohling is the new teacher.

Glee Clubs and orchestra will be organized this week.

Baseball practice has stared with Mr. Gruetzmacher as coach.

We are trying to arrange for games with Corwith and Kanawha this fall.

A number of the former students have visited school the past week.

The lecture course this year will consist of the four numbers listed below, Sason tickets will be sold for $1.50 each. These tickets are transferable.

October: Alton Packard, Cartoonist.
December: Stone Platt, Musical.
January: Fine Arts, Musical.
February: Ratto, Impersonator.

The school has tried this year to bring some worth while entertainment to Belmond, and will need the support of the entire community. The course costs $400 and is guaranteed by the Redpath Vawter Bureau to be refined, and entertaining to all who attend.

Plan now to get season tickets when the high school students call upon you. Boost for clean, high standard entertainments.

Each pupil will be assigned a locker in which to keep his wraps and other belongings. If the pupil wishes to get a key in order to lock his locker, he may do so by depositing 25 cents at the time the key is given him. At the end of the school year when he returns the key, the 25 cents deposited will be returned to him. The securing of a locker key by the pupils is not compulsory, but a matter of choice.

There are a number of eighth grade graduates in Belmond and vicinity that should take advantage of the opportunity to attend high school. Start now and make the most of the opportunity offered.

The Iowa Compulsory Law requires the attendance in school of all children under 16 years of age who have not completed the eighth grade. Children who are 14 years of age may be excused by the Board of Education until the first Monday in December, upon affidavit that child's help is needed to support the family. The Board must decide whether child is to be excused. Penalty is a fine for each half day's absence, and subject to a jail sentence if fine is not paid.

There are a number of grade pupils not in school who come under this law. Parents should see that they are in school next Monday.

Parents are asked to plan their work so they can visit school in session and see what their children are actually doing.

Are you interested in forming a Parent-Teachers Association this year? If you are, let us know and a meeting will be called for organization if sufficient patrons are interested. What is YOUR answer?

If you have a child in high school or in the Eighth grade and have not received a copy of the High School pamphlet of the Course of Study have him call at Mr. Fyler's office and get one. It outlines the High School activities and work.

KANAWHA WINS LAST GAME OF SEASON

The Kanawha ball team made the usual run and took the local aggregation into camp Sunday in the last game of the season by a 5 to 3 score. The local team completely outplayed the Kanawha bunch, but they couldn't do one thing that Kanawha could: make their errors at a time when they wouldn't count for much. Belmond scored in the first inning on an error, a sacrifice and a hit. Kanawha evened it up. Then Belmond scored two more, and errors gave Kanawha a tie. In the seventh, with the bases full, two men were put out, and then errors gave them two runs, and the game. You have to play mighty good ball to beat Kanawha, at any time, and then some luck besides to counter-balance that which they have. It was a good game, however, clean all the way thru, and without any chewing the rag or beefing or fighting. The crowd was about one-third the usual size.

BELMOND LOSES OUT ON GARNER TOURNAMENT

The Garner tournament was won by Lake Mills, which took every game they were scheduled to play, defeating Kanawha the first day, Dows the second and Wesley the third. Belmond, who had expected to get in on the third day, met a sad surprise in their game the second day, when they met the Wesley team, substituted for the Kanawha team after the latter broke up. Wesley's southpaw pitcher was a complete mystery to the local hitters, and not until the 9th inning did they get a score, the final result being 4 to 1 for Wesley. Pillmer was on the mound for Belmond. The crowds at the tournament were just ordinary, and to the ordinary observer it was difficult to see how the tournament could pay out. The rainy weather and the circus at Mason City had a great deal to do with the small number present.

KING'S HERALDS ELECT

The King's Heralds, a children's missionary society of the Methodist church, had their annual meeting last Saturday at the home of Randall Klemme. Their Superintendent, Mrs. A. W. Martin, had previously given each member a dime with which to earn more money during the summer, and the proceeds were returned at the meting on Saturday. The amount earned, including the rontents of the mite boxes, was about $20.

The newly elected officers were:
President—Ruth Ramsay.
Vice Pres.—Darlaine Reike.
Secretary—Helen Luick.
Treasurer—Randall Klemme.
Corres. Sec. —Harriet Martin.

DOWS LEGION TO HAVE BIG DAY THE 15TH

The big day of the year for Dows is scheduled for today, Thursday, when the American Legion of that place stages a festival. Many of the best attractions have been secured to fill the program for the day, among them being a ball game and a big dance. Belmond was scheduled to meet the Dows team, but owing to the inability of some of the local players to get away, Ryder's Independents were secured, and some of the local players will be with that team. Everything at the festival is free except the ball game and the dance. Quite a few local people are planning to go down in cars providing the weather permits.

One of the most remarkable feats of salesmanship that has been completed this year is the record made by the Belmond Auto Co. in the sale of Ford cars. The firm contracted in the spring for 60 cars, and to date they have sold 58 of the 60. L. Tokman of the firm says that practically every one of the sales was made on a cash basis. He has sold the cars as far north as Mason City. (The territory restrictions have been taken off on Ford agencies.) Considering the times, this is certainly a most remarkable feat of salesmanship.

Informal Opening Of Country Club Held Last Friday

Members And Families Enjoy The Day At Grounds By Golf And Supper

ABOUT 100 ARE PRESENT

The informal opening of the Clarmond Country Club was held last week Friday at the club grounds on the shores of Lake Cornelia, with a very successful and pleasant time reprted. There were about 100 present, just the members and their families being in the crowd. Supper was served at six o'clock. The afternoon was spent in playing golf, and in the evening a dance was held, an orchestra from Mason City furnishing the music, and the party was over about 11:00 o'clock in the evening.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN FAIR GROUNDS

News: Sponsors for the Wright County Fair Association beleive that proposed changes in the fair association and in the grounds are worthy the consideration of Wright county people as a whole, and at the Commercial club meeting in Clarion tonight these plans be discussed and outlined for the benfit of the local supporters of the fair.

It is recognized that the center of any activity seeking to promote the welfare of the fair is where the fair is located, but it is also recognized that the growing interest which is being taken in the fair since the past two fairs have been staged the county over is strong enough to warrent enlisting the support of ndividuals from every section section of the county.

What Folks Would Like to See

The proposed changes in the grounds include a regrouping of barns and the rebuilding of the race track on the east side of the fair grounds track. Permanent buildings would be built, a new grandstand would go up and from the main entrance would stretch the midway of attractions. By re-arranging the race track it would be made possible for people on foot to see practically every step of the racing. There would be provided larger grounds for the crowds, adding to the comfort and convenience of our guests. There would be enlarged facilities for the exhibtion of livestock, for machinery, and the like.

The expense of making these changes would not be prohibitative. it is believed, for in any event a new grandstand will have to be built within a year or so. With a permanent set of buildings and grounds the association would be relieved of several hundred dollars of expense annually for tents and labor, which, under present conditions, is money thrown away. With the changes, the Wright county fair would have buildings and grounds which would not be bettered at any county fair in the state. We have an ideal site, and by improving it as proposed, the attractions to the average fair-goer would be added to.

There is no disposition in Clarion to allow the fair to die. The support of the county as a whole, under what might be termed very unfavorable conditions, justifies our people in this decision. And prominent farmers and stockmen from various sections of the county unit in saying that the fair is being conducted in such a way as would merit the whole-hearted support from the county.

It is hoped to have a full ... at the commercial club meeting night, for the subject will be presented more thoroly than it possible in a short newspaper article.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to thank our friends and neighbors for their kindness and help in the illness and death of our son, Stanford Sarber, and for the beautiful flowers.

Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeon Sarber.

ONE MORE BAND CONCERT THIS SEASON

The last band concert of the season will be held on the street on this week Saturday night. The band had contracted for a total of 16 concerts for the season. The concerts have been more than pleasing, and have been worth their cost—$1,600—even in these close times, and it is to be sincerely hoped that they will be a common attraction on our streets next year.

A good band is something that any town can be proud of, and the Belmond band is among the best amateur organizations in the state.

NELSON-TOMSON

Mr. Otis Nelson and Miss Mary Tomson were quietly united in marriage last week Tuesday morning at 11:30 o'clock, at Albert Lea, Minnesota, the Rev. Anderson of the Lutheran church at that place performing the ceremony.

The couple drove up, and after the ceremony went on to attend the state fair of Minnesota, returning on Sunday night.

The bride is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. T. O. Tomson, and one of the most charming young ladies of the city Mr. Nelson is employed with the Belmond Telephone Co. and is an industrious, capable young man and will make his bride a happy and prosperous home.

The young couple will reside in the Dybdahl house next to the C. J. Jones residence, and will be at home after Monday, September 19. The Independent takes pleasure in joining with the friends of the happy pair in extending congratulations and best wishes for a happy life together.

MORE SCRAPPERS ARE FINED

Monday night Mayor Barry fined two more men for being mixed in the riot staged at a recent ball game here between Kanawha and Belmond, the two men being Gilligan of the Kanawha team, and Jack Finn of this city. Finn was fined ten dollars and costs, and Gilligan five dollars and costs.

RIKANSRUD—FORRISTALL.

Today, Wednesday, at Belmond accurred the marriage of Hannah Ragnhilda Rikansrud and Ralph William Forristal. The Lutheran minister of Belmond officiated.

The bride is the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ole T. Rikansrud who reside south east of town, is of exceptionally fine character, possessed of all the qualities needed to make a happy home. Everyone in this community knows and respects Hannah and extends to her and her husband their very best wishes.

The groom is not known personally to the writer but is held in high esteem by those who know him. His home is at Belmond and there Mr. and Mrs. Forristall will be at home to their many friends after September twentieth.—Reporter.

PURCELL-ESQUE

Wedding bells continue to ring and bridal showers are very popular.

A. L. Purcell, lately a resident of the Soldiers Home at Marshalltown, and Mrs. Esque, of this place, were quietly married in Mason City on Thursday, Sept. 8, at the home of the bride's brother, Charley Burkett.

The affair really savors of an elopement, for as Mr. Purcell stepped off the M. & St. L. train Tuesday evening he was hustled into a car where the bride and her brother were waiting, and whisked off to Mason City before anyone saw them.

Romance is not dead; and we are glad that some people never grow old, and we wish this estimable young (?) couple many happy days together. ***

MEMORIAL TABLET PLACED ON CITY HALL GROUNDS

A tablet containing the names of the soldiers and sailors from Belmond who died in the world war, has been placed on the city hall grounds, the tablet being fastened to a large boulder.

EDDIE RIERSON DIES MONDAY FROM INJURIES

Speeding Car Crashes Into Party Near Humboldt And Results In Death

BOYS WERE FIXING TIRE

Man From Humboldt Driving Ford 40 Miles An Hour After Night Responsible

This community was greatly shocked on Monday morning of this week when word was received here that Eddie Rierson had been fatally injured in an automobile smash-up near Humboldt. The young man died from the injuries at 6:00 o'clock Monday morning.

Eddie, together with four friends, were in a Chevrolet enroute to Ft. Dodge about 9:00 in the evening, and about six miles south of Humboldt they experienced some tire trouble. Eddie was out on the ground placing the jack under the wheel, and another young man in the party, Severson by name, was unscrewing the bolts in the rim of the wheel. According to the story of the boys, a Ford car, driven by a Mr. Casper of Humboldt, was coming from the north at a rate of speed which the boys estimated at 35 to 40 miles an hour. A large Buick, driven by a Mr. Grady, of the same place, was coming from the south, at a speed of 15 to 20 miles. The Ford coming at a terrific gait struck the Buick, which had practically stopped, and glanced off to the side and into the Chevrolet.

Eddie was struck by one of the springs on the Ford and jammed into the Chevrolet, his chest being crushed, internal organs injured and his face badly cut and mashed.

Casper, the driver who ran into the car, never stopped, according to reports, and his name and car license number was accertained by the gentleman in the Buick.

Eddie was immediately rushed to town and given every possible aid, but he had been too badly injured, and passed away at six o'clock the next morning.

The remains were brought to Belmond, where funeral services were held Wednesday afternoon at 1:00 o'clock, at the Norwegian church, the Rev. Jensen in charge, and interment made in Franklin Grove cemetery.

Eddie was 24 years of age, the son of Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Rierson of Belmond, and a young man of many friends and capabilities. Since last March he had been in charge of the creamery at Thor, Iowa, where he had been making good in his business. His death makes the second that has occured in the Rierson family within a year, and they have the symathy of the entire community in their hour of grief and sadness.

It is not known at this writing just what steps are to be taken toward prosecuting Casper for the accident, but some steps will doubtless be taken, and this is his second offense of a like character it is apt to be a hard matter for him to settle.

RUNS NEEDLE THRU FINGER

Mrs. Geo. Norris, Jr., had the misfortune this week of running a needle entirely thru her finger, causing an exceedingly painful wound. She was sewing with the machine, and in some manner her finger got in the way of the needle, the steel entering her finger on the under side and going thru the entire finger, nail and all. She was alone at the time, and immediately went across the road to the Harbison residence, where Mrs. Harbison with the aid of a pair of pliers, endeavored to pull the needle out, to no avail, the point breaking off in the finger. Dr. Steele was called and extracted the needle. Mrs. Norris has an extremely painful but not dangerous wound.

FREE AIR!

Nobody seems to want to tackle the job of blowing up the Air, so it looks like it was up to us to get the pumps working again. We were hoping that the gentle public would take over the job; a change of pastures, sorta like.

Anyway, we've been in poor shape lately to take care of the Air.

We've been learning chess.

Oi, what a head ache! Attorney Jensen gave us a lesson the other day, and so help us, when he got thru with the first lesson we felt like a dish of spaghetti that had gone thru a train wreck.

Chess is something like checkers, only different. That explains it thoroly. Only different. In fact, chess is different than anything we ever run up against.

It takes brains to play the game, and lots of them. We've learned that much about it anyway. Which is a lot, all things considered.

The Undertakers are going to have a big time at the county seat town this month. You can make your own on that. The question arises, when Undertakers get together do they have a good time or is it a dead affair?

And speaking of mournful affairs, we saw a fellow on the streets of Belmond the other day with a face on him that was enough to give Fatty Arbuckle the blues—if he didn't already have them.

This fellow's map didn't grow that way; it wasn't natural; it was just a part of his own work. You'd think to glimpse his visage that he had one foot in the grave and the other on a banana peel. He might have had the tooth ache, but he had the appearance of having just lost his fortune or his mother-in-law had come to stay.

You couldn't help feel sorry for him in a way, but nobody's any business parading their gloom around in public that way; the world's got too many skeltons in their own closets to want to poke around in somebody else's.

You've probably seen some queer mistakes in the Independent, for it happens in the best regulated families, but there was one in the Globe Gazette the other day that was a good one. It was about a young lady swimmer who had just broken a record or a rib or something. Her name was supposed to be Gade. The Globe said that "Miss Gad, the 2 year old swimming instructor —" Now no 2 year old girl ought to be left Gadding around the ocean that way. It ain't right. Somebody ought to be reprted to the society for prevention of cruelty to children, letting a 2 year old run around like that.

We present for your kind consideration in another column the latest fit suffered by Dorg of the angelic Reporter. There is no need of any comment, the actions of the police court and the testimony offered will be all the comment that is needed. Besides, we don't care to growl all summer long with Dorg, and we don't belive anybody wants us to. We offer his offering without comment. He who runs may read.

NINE REASONS GIVEN BY THEODORE ROOSEVELT FOR GOING TO CHURCH

1. In this actual world, a churchless community, where men have abandoned and scoffed at or ignored their religious needs, is a community on the rapid down grade.

2. Church work and church attendance mean the cultivation of the habit of feeling some responsibility for others.

3. There are enough holidays for most of us. Sundays differ from other holidays in the fact that there are fifty-two of them every year—Therefore on Sundays go to church.

4. Yes, I know all the excuses. I know that one can worship the Creator in a grove of trees, or by a running brook, in a man's own house just as well as in church. But I also know as a matter of cold fact the average man does not thus worship.

5. He may not hear a good sermon at church. He will hear a serman by a good man who, with his good wife, is engaged all the week in making hard lives a little easier.

6. He will listen to and take part in reading some beautiful passages from the Bible. And if he is not familiar with the Bible, he has suffer er a loss.

7. He will take part in singing some good hymns.

8. He will meet and nod or speak to good quiet neighbors. He will come away feeling a little more charitably toward all the world, even toward those excessively foolish young men church-going as a soft performance.

9. I advocate a man's joining in church work for the sake of showing his faith by his work.

CANNING FACTORY FINISHES WORK

The Hampton-Kelley Canning Company closed its 1921 season's pack Saturday afternoon following a fifteen days run which is the shortest in the history of the plant. However, during that time the company made a pretty good record for the total pack is over 53,000 cases, or approximately a million and a quater cans of sweet corn.

The company here was among the few in Iowa to operate at all this year and contracted for less than 700 acres as against 1,200 last year. Farmers who were fortunate enough to be numbered among the patrons of the factory are feeling jubilant for it gives them ready cash at a time when that article is rather scarce.

The quality of the sweet corn this year was prime, both in size and fullness of the ear, free from worms and untouched by frost, and the yeild was sufficient to give the grower a reasonable profit.

IOWA PRESS ASSOCIATION

WHY EDITORS GO BUGS

It takes a person with a cast-iron constitution, a cold-blooded nerve, and an ability to forget to run a news paper.

We never realized how much so until the other day we were figuring. Figuring how many chances there are each week to make a mistake, and how easy. It requires no figuring to know what the results of a mistake will be; sad experience has taught any editor after he has been in business one week, or put out his first paper. If you get one letter in a name that is eight ax-handles long, sounds like a disease is spelled like some sort of foreign cheese and pronounced with a sneeze, a hiccough and a swallow, you hear about it.

The chances for making them are enough to stagger any but the hardest hearted. Take the Independent, for instance (let's do some figuring togther now). There are eight pages with six columns to the page. That makes

Columns	48

There are approximately 140 lines of type to the column. In one column that makes

1 column's lines	140

There are an average of six words to the line, let us say (there really are more) and in one column of type that makes

1 column's words	840

Then figure an average of five letters to each word:

1 column's letters	4,200

Two hundred and one thousand, six hundred chances for making a mistake in every issue of an eight-page, six-column paper.

Do you get that, folks? Figure it out; then figure what the poor printer has to look out for every blomin' week. The chances are, as you can see, 200,000 to one against him! For one mistake, no matter if he found the other two hundred thousand, five hundred and ninety-nine will stick him.

The remarkable thing is not that there are so many mistakes, but that there are so few.

HOME TOWN PAPER WEEK

It is very rare that the average newspaper boosts its own business, but gives quantities of space in boosting the affairs of others.

Somebody suggested that it was time for the newspapers of the country to adopt a week in which their own business should be given precedent, and the Independent thoroly endorses the idea.

The date set is the second week in November, from the seventh to the 12th, including that great world event Armistic Day.

The official title for the week will be "Subscribe for Your Home Town Paper Week."

Thousands of papers will join in this event, and our readers will hear more about it as time goes on.

Every ready to help in any cause that is in the interests of a better communit, better living conditions, and better government, we now ask the readers and advertisers of the Independent to turn in and lend a hand during "Subscribe for Your Home Town Paper Week" and boost for us.

CLIPPINGS

Nothing can come of it—not being straight,
The blossoms and beauty and goodness of fate
Are born for the lowly, the humble and wise
Who keep the clean faith of the infinite skies.
And manly and upright in honor of deed
Making living life straight the real core of their creed.

Nothing can come of it—not being right,
The joy and the laughter and music and light
Are made for the fellows who stand in the sun
And are never ashamed of the things they have done
And are proud to have battled with self and come thru
As clean and as sweet and as fresh as the dew.

Nothing can come of it—not being square,
The birds and the blossoms, the trees and the air
Are meant for the strugglers who who stand forth and cry
They've right to look up with their face to the sky
For with them the old justice and kindness and truth
Have kept them clean-hearted in old age and youth.

Last Friday was Mrs. C. E. Barnes' birthday and in honor of the occasion a number of relatives planned a surprise dinner on her. Those who surrounded the festive board were Mr. and Mrs. W. S Pritchard and family, Mr and Mrs. W. I Rosecrans and Mrs. Gittie Finch.—Garner Signal

R. M. Smallpage and Mrs. Jennie Weeks attended the meeting of the Nursing Activities at Belmond Wednesday. The report was that Eagle Grove will in the very near future have a nurse who will be located here Aside from her work she will be subject to emergency calls.—Eagle.

Many will recall that while S. A. Keeler was editor and proprietor of the Belmond Herald, that paper was issued from the Elijah P. Lovejoy press, which press was thrown into the Mississippi river following the death of Mr. Lovejoy at the hands of a pro-slavery mob at Alton, Ill., in 1837. Mr. Keeler subsequently sold this press to Gunther, the candy and museum man of Chicago, and with proceeds received from such sale installed a new printing press. This is mentioned at this time from the fact that the writer recently saw in the paper that this Lovejoy press is now on exhibition as the property of the Chicago Historical Society.—Belmond Correspondence in the Clarion Monitor.

Better have a care about hanging out garments on the clothes line. One day last week five suits of wool underwear and a dress skirt were stolen from the line at the E. R. Martin home in broad daylight. It is supposed a tramp from a passing freight train made the haul.—Monitor.

Five merchants here, dealers in groceries, held a meeting last week and agreed to go on a strictly cash basis beginning at once. The old method of charge accounts which ran into many thousands of dollars for each of the merchants has been abandoned. The delivery system will be continued the same as usual for the present, but those telephoning for goods to be delivered will have to pay the deliveryman when he leaves the goods, and in case the cash is not paid the goods will not be left. —Hampton Chronicle, Sheffield Item.

CHURCH NOTES

METHODIST EPISCOPAL

J. H. Edge, Pastor.

Sunday school at 10:00 a. m.

Preaching services at 11:00 a. m. and 8:00 p. m.

Epworth League devotional meeting at seven p. m.

The attendance at the services last Sunday indicates that vacation days are over. The increased attendance was especially noticeable at Sunday school. A justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania recently said that "the fullest citizenship is incomplete without an early church touch." In line with this thought is the declaration of a former governor of New Jersey, "that if the choice had to be made it would be better by far that our colleges be destroyed, and that our Sunday schools be saved." He was not thinking disparagingly of our colleges, but he was emphasizing the value of the Sunday school.

A welcome awaits you and your children in the Sunday school and the other services of the church.

HUBBY TANKS UP; WIFE HIDES IN CORN FIELD

Chronicle: Carl Waddin, who resides near Faulkner, and is said to have been engaged at tiling work, celebrated labor day in a hilarious manner. He went to Ackley, where he said he tanked up on some of the real stuff, then came back home and mixed drinks with some choise corn wine he had on hand.

The stuff in his "inside" soon began to "heat" and he made things boil around his home with threats until things became so warm that his wife was forced to flee for her life and ran out into the nearby corn field, where she hid all the afternoon. Waldin later sobered up enough to imagine that his wife had left, been stolen or estrayed, and he went to Geneva and called Sheriff Atkinson to come down and help locate the missing spouse. The sheriff was soon on the job at Faulkner, and when he arrived he took a survey of the situation and discovered the real trouble.

In a short time the wife made her appearance, after discovering that the officers were present, but she refused to remain there alone with her husband, so the sheriff loaded the whole family into his automobile and brought them to Hampton, and lodged the man in jail. Tuesday morning Waldin was taken before Judge Parks, who, after hearing the evidence gave Mr. Waldin thirty days in jail, but suspended the sentence during good behavior. The court gave Waldin a severe reprimand, and it is beleived that it will do some good—especially with the thirty day sentence hanging over him.

The officers made another trip to the Waldin home and located ten gallons of fine wine, which they brought to Hampton. It is said that Waldin manufactured the wine himself. They also found several parts of the cook stove scattered around the door yard, which Waldin had thrown out during his spree on Monday afternoon.

Mrs. Waldin, who has several children by a former husband, says that she married Waldin about a year ago, and for several months, before he began to drink corn whiskey they had a happy married life. They have a baby about three weeks old.

KANAWHA REPORTER GROWING WINGS

The Reporter did not intend to give space to a write-up of the "riot" or "war" which took place at the baseball game at Belmond, Sunday August 28th, but in justice to the Kanawha baseball boys and fans we are forced to on account of the unjust malicious and dirty report of the affair published in Belmond's papers. Not being satisfied with the misleading publicity they could give Kanawha thru their local press Belmond also saw fit to hearld it thru the columns of the Mason City Globe-Gazette

Kanawha was given entire blame for the whole affair, when the plain truth of the matter was the whole affair should be placed on the umpire. Decision after decision was so rotten that it was truly ridiculous. Our battery had about as much a chance as the proverbial snowball in hades. Yepsen was pitching in good form but if he could not coax a batter to swing at the ball there was no such word as "strike" in that ump's vocabulary, while Kanawha batters were forced to strike at anything or be mowed down by the ump's decision. Just once did he call a third strike on a Belmond batter who did not swing on the ball and then he did it apologetically. Just because why he should apologize we will leave to the reader to ferret out. Certain it is he did not apologize to Kanawha batters. Decisions at bases were also in keeping and when a Kanawha runner reached third base on Locke's two-base hit in the eighth inning and the ump declared him out it was too much for the fans. The base man did not come within three feet of the runner, yet the Belmond Independent said it was a "limsy" excuse to start trouble. Just what meaning the Independent intended to convey we do not know but we can truthfully say that it was the coarsest piece of work we ever saw attemped. A few Kanawha fans became so indignant at the continuation of this kind of work that they could no longer keep themselves in check and they made the error of going onto the field. A Belmond fan rushed up and struck a Kanawha fan who was being held by an officer and a free-for-all fight ensued. Of course Kanawha was all to blame. Had it not been for the decision which was such a plain, open steal that even Belmond fans hung their heads, and the hasty action of Belmond's fan who struck that cowardly first blow there would have been no fight. It simply was too much and Kanawha fans fought for their rights. After the demonstration which was due to much haste by both Belmond and Kanawha fans, Kanawha ball boys conceded to the steal and manfully continued the game, winning in the ninth inning that which was robbed of them in the eighth. Had such a decision been pulled on Belmond they no doubt would have left the field as they did at Clarion—and their man at Clarion admitted he was out, yet, rather than be defeated they walked off the field and thus disaipointed a large crowd of fans who had paid their money to see a ball game.

There is another point that no doubt had something to do with the ill feeling created between the fans of the two towns, and that was the matter of gate receipts. When Belmond played here they were invited and permitted to have a representative at the gate demonstrating Kanawha's fairness in the matter of giving Belmond their percentage. At the last game at Lake View, Belmonds share was 40 percent as they lost the game, yet they received $145.00 in real money. Now let us quote from the Herald-Press of last week: An enormous crowd witnessed the game."

It was an enormous crowd, yet no Kanawha representive was premitted to take part in the collection of the receipts and while Kanawha won the game, entitling them to 60 per cent of the money, they were only permitted to bring home $87.00. The truth is a hard pill to swallow but as it is one of Belmond's own making, it is up to them to gulp.

Premit us to quote from the Independent, the little joke sheet alibi that is about as soothing to a real baseball fan as the Twin City Reporter is to a bigamist:

"Belmond does not have trouble with other teams only with Kanawha and the best thing to do is to ostracise them."

Isn't that the lie for you though? Actually it's so rich that we begrudge the space to contradict it. If Belmond hadn't had trouble with every team they played it wouldn't seem so ridiculous. Hampton had trouble with them; West Bend had trouble with them; Clarion had trouble with them, and Belmond went home witout finishing the game; Algona had trouble with them; Luverne had trouble with them and Kanawha had trouble with them. These were practically all the teams in this secion playing ball this season. Whenever the game was won regardless of the tactics used to gain a victory the little alibi came out bowing, wreathed in smiles and told how lovely it all happened.

Belmond certainly has some license to talk of ostracizing any ball team. To begin with, they were not in a class with Kanawha and should have been ignored by our management. They were outclassed even after refusing to play unless they could name their own umpire. Kanawha hired a real umpire for most of her games but Belmond refused to play if he was used when they met us. The said umpire also refused to come when we met Belmond as one experience with them was sufficient for him. Practically every other team Kanawha has played this season was well pleased with this man, yet Belmond maintains that he was crooked.

We could mention several other things that are repulsive to the mind of good, clean sportsmen; especially the attitude of the Independent, which has contributed as much if not more than any other thing to create trouble between the two towns, but we are loathe to do so. In conclusion let us ask: Is the world wrong and Belmond right or is there a possibility that they too, have erred? "The truth Will Out."—Reporter.

GAME IN CORNFIELD

Hampton Chronicle: Sheriff Atkinson and Deputy Millett made a raid on a cronfield one mile west and a half mile north of the fair grounds corner last Sunday afternoon and rounded up seven of the local poker fans, who were indulging in a quiet little game.

The men appeared Monday morning before Judge D. W. Parks and had their trial. L. B. Walker, who was an onlooker during the game testified that he was there for an hour and a half, but had not seen any money in the game during all that time. He stated also that he had to look over some tile ditch in that vicinity and that he was thinking a good deal about that, which may have been the reason he did not see any money. R. S. Jamison also testified for the fellows, who were charged with putting their money on the card game, and in his testimony admitted that there was money in the game, but that the game was smear and the money was used solely for counting purposes.

Sheriff Atkinson and Deputy Sheriff Millett gave their version of the meeting and said that when they first came upon the crowd there was a fair sized pile of money in the middle of the automobile curtain, around which the gamblers were seated, and two large piles in front of two of the men.

Judge Parks considered the evidence and fined all the members of the party, E. P. Cronin, W. H. Minier, F. C. Holmes, E. H. Quin, P. P. Hamlett, R. S. Jamison, and Roy Sawyer, $10.00 each and costs.

NEWLYWEDS, IN BATHING, ARE HELD IN SOAK

Two newlyweds from St. Louis visiting Creston friends drove to the country yesterday. They knew of an inviting lake bordered with trees and just the place for a swim on that hot August afternoon.

Disrobing under a big elm tree they plunged in. After a frolic in the water that filled them with Iowa vigor and ozone they thought it time to hasten back for the evening meal.

But—horrors! Approaching the spot where they had carefully laid out their clothing they discovered about a hundred angry bumblebees buzzing about. With trousers and shoes and stockings, and lingerie, etc., closing the entrance to their nest the bumblebees were red with anger.

The newly weds beat a none too hasty retreat to the water, where safety for the time at least was offered. And there they remained. The afternoon sun was slowly sinking and so were the hearts of the visitors. The groom felt he was just as much of a hero as they make 'em, but he had never counted on a fight with a lot of crazy bumblebees. The bride agreed it was too risky for "him" to advance on the enemy, but what were they to do? They didn't know.

Minutes—it seemed like hours—passed and the problem seemed no nearer solution, until finally a friend who was out searching for them arrived in sight and with the aid of a long pole the garments of the newlyweds was rescued and a drive home in the evening shadows brought peace and an end to the not altogether perfect day.

The Juniors and Seniors accompanied by Miss Cowley and Miss Osterhus enjoyed a get-together picnic at the old mill site last Thursday after school. M. E. CHURCH NOTES

Next Sunday, Sept. 18, will be regarded in the Methodist church as Rally Day for Sunday school scholars and parents. Some statistician has stated that 50 percent of the children of our communities are out of the Sunday school. While that statement doesn't hold good so far as Rowan is concerned, yet there is quite a number of children who do not attend either of the two Sunday schools. To those who do not have any denominational connection the Methodist Sunday school board extends a special invitation for next Sunday. The attendance objective for the school will be 110—will you be one?

The pastor of the M. E. church, Rev. Harold Tomkinson, will take as his topics for next Sunday "All In the Same Boat," and "The Man Who Asked for a Big Job."

HOW MUCH LOWER ARE PRICES?

Last week a lady asked us to reline a suit she bought of us two years ago. Our records showed that she paid $70.00 for it. While it was in our workroom we compared it with the present season's suits. We are today selling similar quality suits at $35 to $38.75. Our suits priced at $58.75 to $88.75 we believe to be the best values in Northern Iowa, and they too show the same decline.

AN OPENING OFFER
To Introduce Our Fall Shoes

A woman's high grade welt black lace shoe, military heel, at

This shoe was formerly wholesaled by its makers at $8.50 the pair. It is made out of the best wearing material known to the trade. It has solid leather insoles--counters and the outsoles are oak leather which means that the soles were steeped in oak bark liquid for several months until they were thoroughly toughened and tanned---making the best sole to be had. We have all sizes and widths and can properly fit all feet. We honestly believe the 100 pair we are offering at this price to be the greatest shoe value to be offered in Mason City this year.

The local ball team met a rather uneepectd surprise at the Garner tournament last week Thursday, when the team from Wesley, which had been substituted for the Kanawha team, which flunked out, put it all over the local aggregation, winning by an easy score of 4 to 1. Inability to hit the southpaw of Wesley was the big reason for the bitter medicine, combined, perhaps, with an underestimation of the enemy.

Mr. and Mrs. John Arends and children from Alexander were visitors here with friends on Saturday of last week.

The Kanawha ball team has gone to the bad, and has disbanded for the season. The reasons reported seem be mostly the fact that there was more or less disagreement amonng the team. Some wanted to play at the Garner tournament, as they had agreed, while others wanted to go to Algona to play at the fair. As a result, and some of the hired men leaving to attend college anyway, the managers of the team disbanded it on Thursday morning. The officials of the Garner tournament, where the Kanawha team was scheduled to play Belmond that day, are reported as being pretty peeved over the dea handed them. The Kanawha team immediately reorganized, under th name of the Lake View Independents, and played Belmond in the last game of the season Sunday.

The Clarion Commercial Club at their meeting last Thursday took up the proposition of securing a tourists park there, for the use of camping parties going thru. The idea is a good one, and Belmond ought to do something along the same line. The latter part of last week the editor of the Independent had a tourist ask if the town had such a park, and when told that there was no such place, the inquiry was made as to where his party could camp for the night. The Independent sent him to the city park, and the party pitched their small tent there for the night.

Mr. and Mrs. Leo Veeder are the parents of a baby girl, born last week.

Quite a few of the local people were at Garner last Thursday to see the game between Belmond and Kanawha, but were disappointed as the Wesley team was substituted following the disbanding of the Kanawha outfit.

Mrs. Wm. Harbison has returned from her visit witr various relatives in the southen part of the state. She has been gone for several weeks.

The authorities over at Hampton held a surprise party on some of the citizens of that town one day last week, and raided them at a poker game being held in a corn field. The party was brought before the mayor and given more or less of a talkin to and assessed a fine.

Mr. and Mrs. Bernold Kinseth and family have moved into the house on Fourth Avenue S. E., formerly occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Steinlicht, who recently moved to a farm west of Kanawha.

Miss Viva Rourk went home to Kanawha the latter part of the week for a short stay at the home of her relatives there.

A few local folks attended the big circus held at Mason City on last week Thursday. The number, however, was not as large as had been expected. Some of the old timers of the city ought to remember when the now world-famous Ringling Bros. got their start in Belmond. According to legend, they arrived here dead broke, up against it, but they had such a crowd that they were able to continue, and had better luck from that time on. If some of the old-timers who remember the episode will write it, the Independent will be glad to publish the manuscript.

Mr. and Mrs. Rosecrans visited at Garner last week with relatives and friends.

An item unintentionally left out last week was that of a shower given Mrs. Earl Haupt, nee Miss May Schanck, at the home of Mrs. Harold Nielson. Some twenty-five or more guests were present, and the bride-to-be was the recipient of many beautiful and useful presents. Refreshments were served and the evening spent in a social time.

Harry Sorenson, who lives at Owatonna, Minnesota, has some of the best potatoes that have been raised around this part of the country for many years, the crop being raised on peat ground, generally supposed to be poor soil for that kind of vegetables. Harry has a very large crop of spuds this year, and is selling off what he cannot use himself

The Chapman bunch and the ball team from around Morse Lake met in deadly combat, the latter team taking home the bacon by a 11 to 10 score.

Mr. and Mrs. Chris Sorenson and son Chester, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Homdinger drove to Buffalo Center last week for a visit at the home of Bert Sorenson.

J. M. Jensen started teaching ye ed the ancient and honorable game of chess last week. We have hit some pretty difficult propositions in our few years, but we're here to say that chess has anything we ever tackled backed off the map. J. M. is one of the best chess players in the state, and has a record of a five-hour draw with the state champion. If there's any see-it in our head he ought to bring it out. But just at present we sorta feel that it's going to be many moons before we break any records in the game.

$100.00 REWARD

HENRY H. PALS.

Howard Wolle returned last week Friday night from Central America. where he has been working the past three months with the Dyer company on a cane sugar factory being erected in Honduras. Howard says that he likes the climate down there fine that it never gets more than 94. The living conditions, however, are intolerable, the natives having but two ideas; to eat and get drunk, which they do with regularity. He lived with the company, at a cost of $30 a month. He states that Mr. and Mrs. Berry will remain about a month to six weeks longer before returning home. Howard will visit his parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Wolle, a few days before going to Sioux City to resume his old position with the Sioux City Telephone company.

Wallace Ramsay was a business visitor at Garner Tuesday afternoon.

The Clarion school is commencing to talk about its foot ball team for this year. Foot ball is something that has never been tried in the local school to any extent, and judging from the popular sentiment it is not apt to be, most people considering the game of too rough and hard a character for a high school student.

The local school base ball team is being whipped into shape by the instructors and coaches, and plan on a few games this fall. A good stiff line-up of material is on hand and the school team should do something the spring season.

The statements of the two bank are printed in this issue of the Independent, and show a good condition cosidering the present times and the scarceness of money.

'FARM BUREAU NEWS

Farm bureau day at the state fair was a regulation corn maker, which means that it was sizzling hot. Old Sol centered his rays upon the big tent where the federation meeting was held as if it had been a million-acre corn field only one jump ahead of Jack Frost that had to be ripened before night. Farm bureau members packed the tent to capacity and stood around the outside packed it as street car-less Des Moines packs the busses, which is the limit of things comparable. Collars wilted, the grease fried out of the fat folks and the sweat trickled over the bones of the skinny ones. But it takes more than extreme temperatures to get an Iowa farmer's goat, and they stayed on, hungry for federation gospel, stayed from ten o'clock in the morning until six in the evening, with only a short intermission at noon.

From nine to ten in the morning the crowd was delightfully entertained by the American Legion band. For this the federation is indebted to the state fair management. Another enjoyable feature was the singing by the male quartette. Their selections touched the popular chord and they were encored over and over again at every appearance thruout the day.

Prsident C. W. Hunt made the principle address of the forenoon session. His talk dealt principally with what has been accomplished by the federation in its short existance. He told of legislative achievement, and made it plain that in this one field the organization has more than paid for all the time and labor and money put into it. He told of work under way in the line of marketing; of the action of the federation in appearing before the executive council with the result that the valuation of the lands for taxation has not been advanced while everything else has been boosted; he talked of transportation troubles, cost-of-production work, blue sky stuff, etc., and in the end, he made a strong plea for members to be loyal to the organization and to turn a deaf ear to outside interests striving to hamper the work and influence of the farm bureau movement.

Mrs. Richardson of Mahaska county talked on "Women's Part In the Farm Bureau." It was a practical address from the standpoint of the farm woman, telling of the work of the women's branch of the farm bureau, home demonstration activities and other lines of effort. She took a crack at the cigarette "industry" and was enthusiastically applauded by the bid audience. She insists that the farm bureau federation machine, great and glorious tho it is, will never be able to function 100 per cent efficiently until the farm women are enlisted and doing their bit.

A number of speakers appeared during the afternoon. President Howard of the American Farm Bureau federation devoted his time to a discussion of national legislative problems, transportation entanglements and export trade. In connection with the first topic he declared that "Leadership of the U. S. senate has been moved from Massachusetts to Iowa," and in discussing the work of the agricultural block insists, that "The farming interests of the country owe much to the aggressive stand made by these men." In regard to the Esch-Cummins law he said:

"There is much in it that is good and much that is objectionable. We knew that at the time the bill was under discussion a few months ago, But the important thing at the time, the essential thing, it seemed to us, was to accomplish the return of the railroads to their owners. That outweighed all other considerations. And the only way to do that was thru this bill. Any other course meant an indifinite postponement of the return of the roads. As to the guarantee clause the federation was opposed to it at the time and is still opposed to it."

The president is enthusiastic in support of the Great Lakes-to-the-Ocean waterway. "The price of our wheat," he pointed out, "is made in Liverpool. We get what it is worth there, minus the cost of getting it there. Water transportation is notably cheaper than transportation by rail. The proposed waterway will bring the Atlantic ocean 1,200 miles closer to the fields of the middle west and the saving in freight for that distance, which would be 10 cents or more a bushel, would be added to the price received by the grower."

Secretary Coverdale's address had to do largely with the organization work under way by the American Farm Bureau federation. Forty-seven states now have farm bureau organizations, and 45 of them are affiliated with the American Federation.

Mr. Coverdale declared that the cost of production work carried on by the Iowa federation at considerable expense to be one of the best thing done by any state orgagnization. He said they had found it extremely valuable in dealing with business interests, legislative bodies and congressional hearings, where men are required to strip themselves clean of guess work and conjecture and get down to facts. And these cost of production figures and tables are facts that no man can flout.

Probably no man in the country today has a bigger, broader vision of farm bureau work than John Coverdale. It is as limitless as space. And temporary concessions, no matter how attractive, get scant consideration from him unless they can fit into his scheme for the future. Here there are certain things he insist must be kept in mind. One is that the federation must maintain what he calls "a constructive attitude" toward all other farm organizations. It must not undertake to climb by trampling somebody else under foot. He insists that it is not necessary to tear down existing institutions. If they are wrong, or if they in any way fail to serve the purpose for which they were intended, then build something better, if you want the publi to climb into your bandwagogn.

Other speakers during the afternoon were Congressmen Dowell of the Seventh district and Dickinsen of the tenth. Both men delivered corking good talks that were liberally applauded. They are in full sympathy with the federation work as indeed are all the members of the Iowa delegation in congress, and it is the staunch stand of the agriculture block, under the leadership of Dickinson, in the house and Kenyon in the senate that is largely responsible for helping the legislative program of the American federation to get over the top with several important bills.

Concerning the guarantee clause of the Esch-Cummins law, which just now is a paramount topic of discussion, Mr. Dickinson stated that all the members of the agricultural block are in favor of its early repeal, that a bill looking to that consumation has already been prepared and will be introduced immediately after congress gets back toward the latter part of the month.

FARMERS AT PEACE MEETING

The American Farm Bureau federation has asked President Warren G. Harding to provide proper representation for agriculuture in the disarmament conference of the nations to be held in Washington beginning Nov 11th. Farm bureau leaders declare it is essential that the farmer viewpoint receive due consideration in this conference.

Commenting on the significance of organized agriculture's request, President J. R. Howard of the American Farm Bureau Federation said:

"Our failure to ratify the Versailles peace treaty in some manner in 1919 is largely responsible for the slough of despond thru which agriculture is struggling today. The blame for agricultural stagnation must be placed squarely at the door of those who blocked peace ratifications two years ago. If America had in some way or other ended the state of war in 1919, we farmers would be fifty per cent better off than we are today.

"In the disarmament conference President Harding has the greatest opportunity ever presented to any man since Lincoln's day to benefit the entire world. He can undo some of the economic harm caused by the ratification delays and the blocking of world markets for the American farmer. The work of our boys in Chatteau Thierry and the Argonne was lost when the Senate failed to ratify the peace treaty.

"We view with the most hopeful interest the coming conference called by our president to bring about a world disarmament. The need was never greater and no cause more worthy of the most ardent endeavor of the world's greatest statesmen. The United States thru the sacrifices of the civil war struck the shackle from a million slaves. Lincoln became the great emancipator. Despite the great war, the world still remains downcast and distressed, in irons of militarism. Now, we need a world emancipator to strike from the hundreds of millions the galling shackles of militarism. May our president in this coming conference have our most earnest and heartfelt prayers of success, that the burdens of humanity may be lightened and the brotherhood of man thruout the whole world become established.

DRESS FORM DEMONSTRATIONS

A series of dress form demonstrations conducted by Miss Cora Leiby clothing specialist, from the Extension Department, was completed last Friday when a goodly number of farm ladies from Lincoln and Dayton townships met at the Harry Sumner home three miles south of Clarion.

Miss Leiby spent five days in the county demonstrating to the farm ladies the method of making dress forms which are to be used later in making their own clothes. Keen interest seems to have been taken by all ladies who attended and the good which will come from these demonstrations will be measured by the saving which will be made by various women of the county in making their own clothes.

President Harding for Co-operative Marketing

In a book just off the press, entitled "Our Common Country," of which Warren G. Harding, president of the United States, is the author, the attitude of the president toward the farmers' marketing movement is clearly expressed in the following paragrahp taken from the book:

"The right of farmers to form co-operative associations for the marketing of their products must be granted The concert of agriculture is as essential to farms as a similar cnncert of action is to factories. A prosperous agriculture demands not only efficiency in production, but efficiency in marketing. Through co-operative associations the route between the producer and the consumer can and must be shortened. Wasteful effort can and must be advoided. Unecessary expense can and must be eliminated. It is to the advantage of all our people that every possible improvement be made in our methods of getting the products of our farms into the hands of the people who consume them. The legitimate functions of the middleman may continue to be peformed by the private enterprise under conditions where the middleman is necessary and gives his skill to our joint welfare. The parasite in distribution who preys on both producer and consumer must no longer sap the vitality of this fundamental life."

Plan Marketing Help

Plan for goverment assistance in marketing farm products over a longer period than normal, in recognition of the new conditions existing in the international and domestic trade of the United States, are being worked out by the war finance corporation under the agricultural releif act passed two weeks ago, according to Eugene Meyer, Jr., managing director of the corpoation.

The Key that Unlocks the Door to Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

GOLDFIELD ROBBERIES ARE DRY HAULS

News: Entry to two of the Goldfield elevators Friday night netted the amateurs who are believed to be responsible for the jobs, nothing in the way of swag, for the only thing secured was some notes which were not negotiable and which were thrown into a pile of lumber the following day, it is believed. Entries were made thru windows forced open.

The Ford Sedan owned by Earl Anderson, which was stolen the same night, was found the next day a short distance from Goldfield. It is believed the car was taken as a blind.

Goldfield has been getting a reputation for amateur holdups and petty pilfering the past few months. It has been reported that several wayfarers in the Goldfield vicinity have been held up when out driving at night. A couple of months ago the workmen employed on building the Goldfield bridge had their tent looted and two or three hundred dollars worth of clothing were taken. Also some watches, rings, and a little spare cash.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

pecting me. I had business," he added, "with John Moreland."

There came to his ears from somewhere down the river the chorus of a rakish old hill song, and the voice was that of the lanky moonshiner, By Heck—

"Oh, when I die, don't-a bury me deep,
Put no tombstone at my head and feet,
Put a bear's jawbone in my right hand
On my way to the Prom-ised La-a-and,
Oh! On my way to the Promised Land!"

A few minutes later there appeared on the Moreland side of the river the singer of the rakish old song; he had a minnow pail in one hand and a white hickory rod in the other.

"Hi, thar, Bill, old boy!" he yelled. "Hi, thar, Babe! Either of ye'uns ketched anything?"

Ben Littleford's daughter held up a fish proudly. Heck slapped his thigh with his slouch hat.

"Good fo' you!" he exclaimed. "But they ain't a-bitin' jest right. The moon's wrong, and the signs is wrong, fo' fishin'."

At that instant John Moreland appeared at Heck's side. He seemed very serious about something.

"Bill Dale," he called, "come over here."

Wondering, Dale put down his rod and turned to obey. Two minutes later he stood before John Moreland.

"I jest wanted to tell ye," and the mountaineer almost closed one alert grey eye, "'at ye're purty shore to git into trouble over thar."

"I'm an able-bodied man," Dale returned smilingly.

"You shore are," frowned Moreland, "but mebbe you ain't used to durned hard fightin'."

Not used to hard fighting! Dale's smile broadened. Once he had whipped a heavyweight pugilist; and he had fought as a matter of principle, and not for money or prestige.

Moreland suddenly jerked one thumb toward the other side of the stream. Dale looked and saw, standing beside Babe Littleford, a quite formidable man. He had the height and breadth, almost, of a Goliath. He was black-eyed and black-haired, and his thick, short beard was curled like the hair between a bull's horns. In one hand he carried a repeating rifle as lightly as though it were a mere straw.

One of his great arms suddenly straightened toward Dale, and a voice as gruff as the growl of a bear said hotly:

"What was you a-doin' here a-talkin' to my gyurl?"

Babe Littleford looked angry. Dale flushed, then went pale.

"I have a habit of talking with whom I please," he said evenly.

"Spoke like a man," drawled the lanky Heck in a very low tone.

Goliath of the hills stared unbelievingly. Dale said in an undertone to John Moreland: "Is it that Ball fellow?"

"Yes," answered the hillman; "it's Black Adam Ball."

Ball dropped his rifle to the violets, slowly clenched his huge and hairy hands, and thrust his bearded jaw out aggressively.

"I dare ye over here, ye pink coward!" he challenged.

"If you have any business with me, come over here and transact it," Dale retorted. "I won't run."

"That's Moreland terrytory," Ball objected. "But I'll meet ye half way, and I dare ye to take me up, ye lace-trimmed pink mollycoddle!"

Half-way would be the middle of the river, and no place for a fight, surely. But Dale was nettled. His temper, the temper that he had never been able to keep wholly under control, was rising fast. He threw off his coat and hat and rolled the sleeves of his soft shirt to his elbows. Then he waded into the pool. The slowly moving water was up to his waist at the half-way point, and the bottom was of hard-packed sand.

The Goliath stared unbelievingly. He was not accustomed to having his challenges thus accepted. He threw off his hat and went to meet the lithe young stranger.

Bill Dale squared himself and put up his guard. Adam Ball came on, and he was scowling wickedly.

Ball rushed, the clear water swirling in his wake, and let out with a powerful right. It was a blow to crush an ordinary man's chest in; but, to Ball's surprise, it failed to land. Dale evaded it cleverly, and at the same time sent a swift left uppercut to the other's bull-like jaw. Adam Ball muttered two wicked words and steadied himself; he had caught a tartar. A moment, and he led out again, and he missed again; but he followed it with a blow that made a red mark on Bill Dale's shoulder.

"How's that, ye pink coward?" he crowed.

"All right—how's this?"

And Dale sent on a mighty blow that rebounded dully from the giant's chest and elicited only a harsh laugh of contempt. There was little to be gained by striking a man like Adam Ball on the chest; Dale knew now that he must reach a more vulnerable spot.

Then he feinted with his left and drove his right to Ball's mouth, bringing blood. Ball roared in his blind rage and dashed toward his antagonist, resolved to get a clinch. But Dale eluded the terrible arms, although in so doing he received a blow on the temple that made him dizzy for a few seconds.

While Ball was again engaged in trying to gain the advantage of a clinch, Granny Heck made her appearance on the Moreland bank. She promptly launched her sympathies in a manner that pleased both her gaping son and the watchful and silent John Moreland.

"Hit him in the stummick, Mr. Bill!" she cried over and over. "Hit him whar he lives at!"

The combat grew hotter and hotter. Both landed frequently now. The faces of both were bleeding, and each spat red now and then. Their clothing had been torn away to the belt, and their magnificent wet bodies glowed in the morning sunlight. Dale had seriously damaged his soft hands; they felt as though they were filled with slivers of steel. But still he fought on doggedly, determinedly, desperately, minute after minute.

Those on the two banks watched it all with suppressed excitement. Babe Littleford stood in the edge of the water, with her hands clasped below her throat, her face was pale. John Moreland, who had witnessed many other great fights, himself a fighting man, had never before beheld such a contest of strength and endurance as this; Bill Dale had won John Moreland's heart for all time to come.

But the blows of the fighters were growing weaker now. The sound of their labored breathing rose distinctly over the gentle roar of the sparkling waters above.

Then the watchers saw Adam Ball lunge at his man, saw Dale stumble out of sheer weakness, saw Ball's mighty blood-streaked arms close about the beautiful white body and hug it close to his great and hairy chest. A moment, and Ball was bending Dale slowly backward and downward more by reason of weight than of strength; another moment, and Ball was about to sink the brown head under the surface!

Babe Littleford gave a smothered cry. John Moreland stepped toward the water and shouted hoarsely:

"Don't ye drowned him Adam! Ef ye do, ye'll answer to me!"

Dale had gathered himself for a last move. He slipped downward suddenly, immersing himself completely, and shot one arm around Ball's thigh; then, by a great effort, he rose with the giant and overthrew him, and staggered free!

Ball's hairy face came to the surface first. Dale fought back the pain of the water in his lungs, and the pain as of sharp and jagged slivers of steel in his hands, and struck madly, half blindly, at the hateful face. He kept it down, but it wouldn't go under the water completely. . . .

Adam Ball began to drift as though lifeless down the stream. Bill Dale followed, still fighting weakly, choking as he breathed. But soon he ceased to strike. He saw, instead of the beast like face, flashes as of distant summer lightning, and red blotches against a thick blackness. The blotches faded, and all became dark to him; he pitched forward, gasping, and began to drift down the stream with the vanquished Ball.

Babe Littleford was standing in the water to her knees. When Dale succumbed to utter exhaustion, she started toward him, to save him from drowning. She felt strangely drawn toward the big, white, clean man who had whipped the Goliath she had always dreaded. But she had gone only a few yards toward the center of the river when John Moreland and Sam Heck reached the unconscious figures.

Heck dragged Ball to the Littleford bank and left him lying there, face downward, on the sand. Moreland half carried, half dragged Bill Dale to the other bank. Babe Littleford waded out. She paid absolutely no attention to the worsted bully. She stood intently watching the limp form of Dale.

"Is he dead, John Moreland?" she called tremulously.

"No, Babe," Moreland answered, his voice not unkind; "he ain't anyways nigh dead."

He and Sam Heck took up Dale's dripping figure and bore it away. Babe Littleford ran to higher ground, hid herself behind a clump of sassafras and watched them.

Granny Heck followed with Dale's coat and hat. She chattered all the way across the meadow—

"Now what did I tell ye, John and Sam? What did I tell ye? La, la! Wasn't it a master fight, like I said—now wasn't it?"

"Sometimes ye make me a little tired, granny-woman," Moreland remonstrated gently. "The' ain't nothin' in forchune-tellin'. You've jest been here fo' so long 'at you know how to jedge the future by the past. And you're a tol'able good guesser, too, I reckon."

Granny Heck flared up quickly: "Ain't nothin' in forchune-tellin'! Now don't go and fool yeself, John Moreland. You listen to me about a half minute, John. I seed more in the cup 'an I told Mr. Bill. I seed blood and death. I seed a big fight atwixt the Morelands and the Littlefords!"

"That's easy to guess at," John Moreland replied. "You know, o' course, 'at Black Adam will do all he can to bring trouble to us on account o' Bill Dale a-stayin' with us. And you know it ain't never onpossible to hatch up war atween us and the Littlefords. Jest run on ahead, Granny Heck, and tell my wife to hunt up some kind o' good liniment fo' Bill's bruises. Tell her she needn't to waste time a-lookin' up any bandages. This man here is like me: he wouldn't wear bandages, 'cause they look bad."

When Dale came back to a state of consciousness, he was lying under covers in the carved black walnut bed. Beside him stood John Moreland, who held in one hand a bowl containing a hot herb brew that his wife had prepared. Granny Heck, her son By, and Mrs. Moreland stood not far away.

"This here'll be good fo' ye, I think," said Moreland, nodding toward the bowl in his hand. He went over and put an arm around Dale's shoulders and helped him to sit up.

Dale drank the stuff with difficulty.

"Much obliged," he muttered thickly. "I—let's see, did I whip—how did it end? He didn't lick me, did he—that fellow Ball?"

"He shore didn't," smiled Moreland. "Not by a big sight. He fell out fust. His own pap won't hardly know him, Bill!"

* * * * * * * *

News travels rapidly in the big hills. The Morelands began to gather at the home of their chief to see the man who had whipped Black Adam Ball; every Moreland able to walk came to see Bill Dale. For three hours he was lionized, but he didn't enjoy it; the water had left many pains in his chest, and his head ached dully, and his hands still felt as though the bones were shattered in them.

Came a thundershower that afternoon, and the mountain evening fell with a chill. A fire was made in the wide stone fireplace in the guest's room, and when supper was over the family gathered there with Dale, who refused to be kept in bed.

After a few minutes of silently watching grotesque shadows flit across the log walls, Dale said to John Moreland:

"If your brother David could know, don't you think he'd want you to get the value out of the coal?"

John Moreland bent forward to rest his chin in his hands. His sober grey eyes stared thoughtfully toward the fire.

"I ain't never looked at it that-away," he said.

"That's the right way to look at it," declared Dale. "But you shouldn't sell the property as it is."

The mountaineer turned an inquiring face toward his guest.

"How in thunder could I handle it ef I didn't?"

"Why not let me develop it for you?" Dale said earnestly, eagerly. "I won't charge you anything above expenses, and I won't be extravagant."

"It'd take consid'able money to start things a-movin'. Have you got it?" asked Moreland.

"No, but I can get it. Almost anybody would be willing to lend money on so good a thing as this, y'know."

For a little while Moreland sat there and looked squarely at Dale, who returned his gaze without a sign of flinching. The hillman was trying to find a motive.

"How comes it 'at you, who ain't knowed us but two days," he demanded, "can be so much int'rested in us?"

The question demanded a straightforward answer. Dale realized that there was but one way in which he could give a satisfactory explanation, and that that was by telling the truth—but not the whole truth, as he surmised it, for then his efforts would go for naught.

Moreland was speaking again, and his eyes were brighter now.

"I agree 'at David would want us to develop the coal, ef he could know. It's like a light a-breakin' to me. But that coal is sacred to us, Bill Dale, and afore ye go any fu'ther I'll haf to ax ye to tell me all about yeself. A city man up here in the wilderness—it don't look s'picious, Bill, mebbe, but—well, I hopes ye can pardon me fo' axin' it. I shore got to be keerful about Brother David's coal. Addie and the boys'll go out and leave jest us two in here; and when ye're a-talkin' to me it's the same as talkin' to a tombstone so fer as tellin' is consarned. Addie, honey; Luke, you and Cale—"

Mrs. Moreland and her sons arose and left the room, closing the door behind them. Bill Dale paced the floor, arms folded, brows drawn. Finally he halted before the Moreland chief.

"There's nothing I'm ashamed of, I guess," he said. "I don't like to tell it simply because I don't like to tell it. But—I'll do it."

He sat down in his sheepskin-lined rocker, lay back and closed his eyes as though to visualize the story, to live it over.

"Maybe it's not very much in my favor, John Moreland," he began. "I never could get along with my parents, or with the set I was born into. Somehow, I was different. Father and mother wanted me to be a dandy; they even wanted me to let a servant dress me. The climax came when they tried to marry me to a young woman who didn't want me any more than I wanted her."

He opened his eyes, looked straight at Moreland, and went on:

"You see, they wanted to marry us in order to unite old Clavering's fortune and my dad's; Patricia, like me, was an only child. It had been all cut and dried for us, for years. They put it up to me like this: they said I owed it to them, that it was my duty; that I had always been a severe trial to them; that my savagery had put gray into my mother's hair, and a lot of things of that kind. I fell for it at last; it was sort of a matter of self-defense. With Patricia, it was a case of—well, a case of simple obedience. Pat is a good girl. . . ."

A minute of silence; then:

"I'll hurry along with it, John Moreland. I had one fine friend back there. It was Robert McLaurin, a reporter on the city's leading newspaper. My parents didn't take to him because he was a worker, and not a fop. Mother wanted Pat's cousin, 'poor dear Harry' Clavering, for my best man. 'Poor dear Harry' and I had a fight, once upon a time, and I—I had whipped him; and I didn't like him. I chose Bobby McLaurin for my best man, and I wouldn't give him up.

"It was only when we met before the chancel in a big crowded church that I fully realized the tragedy of it for Pat. I saw that her face was a clean white, and that her eyes held the shadow of something that was very terrible. I turned my head and saw the same shadow in the eyes of my greatest friend, Bobby McLaurin. I knew then. Bobby and Patricia loved each other, John Moreland! Bobby didn't have any money to speak of, and that had held them apart.

"It had been the finest thing in the world, McLaurin's acting as best man for me. There was friendship for you! I couldn't take from them their one chance of happiness. . . .

"I couldn't see anything else to do, so I ran. I went home, pulled off my wedding rig and put on the clothes I'm wearing now, threw some things into a bag and hurried down to the union station. I found that I could have my choice between a flier for Atlanta and the—the train that brought me here. I bought passage to Atlanta, but I never meant to use it; I meant to take the other train and pay a cash fare. In doing that, I hoped to lose myself from them. I wanted to go unhindered to some country where I wouldn't be considered a—a savage, y'know.

"I went out to the train-shed, and I hadn't been there a minute when Bobby McLaurin came. I asked him how he knew where to find me. He said:

"'I thought you wouldn't care to stay here after doing what you did, and I wanted to say good-by, Bill.' He always called me that, and it made me feel like a man. Then I put my bag down and took him by both shoulders and told him this:

"'Look here, Bobby, I'm going to give you some advice, and you take it. You steal Pat and marry her. Steal Pat and marry her if you have to live in a hole in a hillside. You're as good as any of them, and lots better than most of them. You can work your way to a better salary. You see,' I told him, 'we get about what we deserve in this world. Most of us don't deserve much.'

"I asked him if mother was badly cut up. He said she was; that she had fainted. Dad swore aloud, he said, there in church. I told Bobby good-by and got aboard the train without saying anything about where I was going—but I didn't know myself where I was going, at the time.

"Now you've heard it. Every word was truth. If you'll trust me with the coal, I'll make this land my land, your people my people. I'll suffer with you when you suffer, and be happy with you when you're happy; and when you fight, I'll fight with you."

The Moreland chief arose, and Bill Dale arose. The hillman put out his hand, and Dale gripped it.

"I believe in ye, Bill," said John Moreland. "Fo' another thing, I've seed ye fight. You can work the coal."

He looked toward the closed inner door and called, "Oh, Addie; you and the boys can come back now."

Out of the night a face appeared at one of the small windows. It was a feminine face and handsome rather than pretty. Two slender, sunburned hands gripped the window-ledge nervously. The face pressed closer to the glass, then disappeared. Soon afterward the outer door of the guest's room opened, and Ben Littleford's daughter entered. Her skirts were dripping wet.

Mrs. Moreland arose and went toward the young woman. She knew that only something of great importance could bring a Littleford into her home in this fashion.

"What's the matter, Babe?"

Babe Littleford gave no attention to Mrs. Moreland. She went on to Bill Dale, walking softly on bare feet.

"Black Adam is a-goin' to kill you tonight, Bill Dale."

"That so?" Dale's smile was rather grim. "How did you find that out, Miss Littleford?"

"I found it out, all right. As he went off from the river this mornin', I made fun of him; and he patted the stock of his rifle and said he'd git you through a window! He was at our house this evenin' to help fix pap's gun, and when he left he started this way, a-goin' by the blowed-down sycamore. I waded the river at Blue Cat shoals to beat him here. I thought you might want to know about it, so's ye could mebbe save other folks the trouble o' makin' a funeral fo' ye."

She backed toward the door, her eyes never leaving Dale's face. Another second, and she was gone.

They were all on their feet now. John Moreland gripped Dale's arm.

"Over thar aside o' the chimbley, Bill!" he ordered, his native drawl for the moment absent. "Out, Addie, honey! Luke, bring my rifle and hat—jump keen! Cale, bring water and drownd this here fire!"

It was done. Moreland took his hat and the repeater and went alone into the night.

When some fifteen minutes had passed, there came to Dale's ears the sound of shooting. There were ten shots in such rapid succession that they made almost a continuous roar. Then came echoes and reverberations, and then silence. Soon John Moreland let himself into the dark room.

His wife's voice was low and filled with anxiety:

"What happened, John?"

A dull thud came through the darkness as her husband's rifle-butt struck the floor.

"This is what happened, Addie: As I passed the cawner o' the house, I got down that thar old oxwhip to take along. I went acrost the road and into the meadow, and thar I seen Adam Ball a-comin'. I hid, and when Adam was about to pass me, I jumped up and jerked his rifle from him and busted it ag'in a rock. Then I lights in and thrashes him with the oxwhip ontel he broke and run. And on this here happened, Addie:

"I was a-watchin' to see ef Adam had reely went off, when I seed a man a-comin' toward me fast. I thought it was Ball, o' course. So I up and tells him to show me how fast he can run and commences a-shootin' over his head to skeer him. But it didn't happen to be Adam Ball—it was Ben Littleford! He was a-follerin' Babe to see what she was up to, o' course."

"How do ye know it was Ben, pap?" Caleb asked.

"How do I know?" growled John Moreland. "When I got through a-shootin', he hollers at me and says: 'Tomorrow, John Moreland,' he says, 'we'll have a little Gettysburg o' our own!' And I might mind ye, Cale, 'at he keeps his word the same as I do."

"And Littleford meant a—" began Dale.

"That the'll be a big fight tomorrow," said Moreland. "Bill Dale, in a-makin' this land yore land and these people yore people, I'm a-feard ye're a-goin' to git more'n ye expected, mebbe more'n ye can handle. Do ye want to back out of it and let the coal go, or are ye one o' these fellers who chaws what they bites off ef it's a hoss's head?"

"I'll stick." Dale's voice came firmly in the darkness. "I'll stick."

CHAPTER IV

The Mystery of the Rifles.

An hour after John Moreland had sent his ten rifle bullets whining over the head of Ben Littleford, every Moreland and every Littleford in the valley knew of the declaration of war. And each man of them oiled his weapons and put them in better working order.

When Dale went to bed, there was too much on his mind to render sleeping easy for him. Tomorrow he would have to help in the fight against the Littlefords, kinsmen of the young woman who had saved him, without doubt, from death by the murderous rifle of the mountaineer Goliath—or break his word flatly. It was a poor return for such a favor! The longer he thought over the dilemma, the more perplexed he became.

He thought, too, of the everlasting wonder, the tail of John Moreland's bedtime prayer. How a man could go down on his knees and ask the blessings of the Almighty upon men whom he meant to fight the next day was a thing that Bill Dale could not understand.

It was after midnight before he slept. He woke at the break of day, arose and dressed himself, and went out. Going toward the flower-filled front yard, he found himself facing a very angry John Moreland.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Matter enough," clipped the mountaineer. "Bill Dale, I'm a-goin' to ax you a question, and I want the truth. Will I git it?"

"You'll get the truth if you get anything. Shoot the question."

"All right. What do you know about my gun?"

"About as much as you know of the left hind wheel of Ben Hur's chariot. What's wrong with it?"

Moreland's eyes were steady and Moreland's Eyes Were Steady and Cold.

cold. He thrust his hands into the pockets of his corduroy trousers. Then his face softened a trifle.

"I reckon I ought to ax yore pardon," he said in a low voice. "Ye see, my gun's plumb gone!"

"You had it only last night," Dale said. "Did it disappear—"

"Whilst I slept," cut in the hillman. "Both o' my guns is gone. And Luke's repeater is gone, and so is Cale's, and we hain't got nothin' at all to fight them d—d Littlefords with!"

"Gone!" Dale exclaimed wonderingly and—it seemed to him—asininely.

"It must ha' been the Littlefords, I guess," frowned Moreland. "Fo' because who else would ha' done it? But to save the life o' me I cain't see how they got in and took my rifle without wakin' me up, Bill Dale. I slept twicet as light as a sick mouse."

IOWA RAILROADS TO FIGHT EACH COUNTY

Des Moines, Sept. 6.—When seven railroads, having lines in Iowa, questioned the fairness of the state in assessing their property for taxation purposes, they attacked a government dragon with ninety-nine heads.

This is the position of Attorney General Ben J. Gibson and the county attorney of Iowa, who held a three hour conferance at the state house last week Monday to prepare the state's defense against the motion of the roads for a temporary injunction restaining their assessments to the county treasurer. In other words, the state will contend, according to Attorney General Gibson, that the roads must prove their claim against each county separately.

The conference was an executive session, after demolishing the claims of the roads verbally, the county attorneys returns to their homes to collect the evidence necessary to combat said claims, and if the position of the state is upheld at the injunction hearing, the railroads who are seeking to escape the increase in their assessments will have 99 law suits on their hands.

The roads asking injunctions against the county auditors are the Burlington, the Northwestern, the Milwaukee, the Rock Island, the Illinois Central, the Wabash and the Minneapolis & St. Louis. Eighteen other railroads and bridge companies assessed by the executive council have taken no action so far to fight their assessments. The Des Moines Union, which operates in Polk county only, has broght action in district court.

The roads claim that the assessment made by the executive council this year indicates a "systematic discrimination" against railroad property as compared with other property assessed. The state will contend that a discrimination, to be systematic, must be coninuous, and since the increase in the valuation of railroad property this summer is the first in eight or ten years, it cannot be said to indicate any systematic attempt to discriminate against railroad property. The roads admit there has been no faud in the assessment and that the roads have not been assessed at their full value.

AT LEEAST TWO CASES OF REAL CHOLERA FOUND

There are at least two herds of hogs in Wright county affected by cholera at this time, according to Dr. J. R. Macdonald, of Clarion, who has vaccinated the herds after the sickness appeaed. Neither of the herds are very large, but a diaginoss reveals that this is the real article. Sanitary measures are being used to check its spread, and farmers the county over should watch carefully as to the condition of their hogs that the least sign of the disease may be noticed and prompt measures taken to combat it.

The Iowa State College veterinary authorities report cholera prevalent in a number of counties, where the loss has already ranged upward to $10,000. Northwestern Iowa has been battling the epidemic for several months and it seems to be growing. Dr. V. K. Stouder of the state college says the necessity for conserving the hog supply of Iowa this year is more urgent than in years, for there is a shortage already, and other states, from which Iowa feeders in the past have purchased stocker hogs, will be in the market this year for hogs in order to feed out the large supply of low priced corn.

Strict sanitation is the best thing to practice after vaccination, he says. —News.

State Tester Will Examine The Dairy Cows In Belmond About That Date

MANY FOUND TUBERULAR

The state tester of cows will be in this city about the first of next month when he will examine all dairy herds for tuberculosis.

It has been requested that those who have not yet made their application for the testing of the:r herds or animal, make the same at once to Mayor Barry, so that the complete schedule may be ready when the state tester arrives.

The testing of herds over the state has caused some very surprising results. At Mason City, one herd there being found 50 per cent tubercular. The Globe Gazette of Tuesday carried the following item regarding the test:

Mason City consumers of m'lk have been drinking milk that is tubercular. This is the information received today from the office of the county agent, and was given out by Dr. Finchman, federal tester, with supervision over a district comprising four counties. Out of one herd of cows supplying milk to residents of Mason City a test applied last week by Dr. Fincham revealed that 50 per cent of them were tubercular.

MESERVEY RIGISTER PURCHASED BY INDEPENDENT; CIRCULATION TO BE COMBINED OCT. 1ST.

Beginning the first of October, the circulation of the Belmond Independent will go to about eleven hundred.

Tuesday of this week the publisher of the Independent closed a deal whereby the Meservey Register is combined with the Belmond Independent, the Register being issued after that date—October 1st—as a part of the Belmond Independent.

The Register has been purchased in 'ts entireity; the plant at Meservey will be dismantled and disposed of, and the Register will be a part of the Independent.

From and after October 1st, each week there will be run in the Independent a two-page insert of the Meservey section, composed of news and advertising, along the same lines as the Register has been issued. The insert wi'l be separate from, but inserted in, the Independent, and will in reality make the Independent a ten-page paper.

The entire circulation of the Register will be added to that of the Independent, giving the Independent a bona fide circulation of very nearly 1,100, all w'thin a trading radius of fifteen miles of Belmond. This circulation will give the local advertiser an increased range to draw trade from, and will mean from 250 to 300 more families whom he can reach each week thru the columns of the Independent.

Miss D. Grace Wilson, the present editor of the Register, desired to dispose of the plant and office, and talked business to the Independent, with the result that the deal was finally closed. The Independent has a contract with the business men of Meervey for a year's advertising, to be run in the Meservey insert to the Independent, the subcribers to receive the combined papers, meaning, that all subscribers to the Register are added to the Independent circulation list and receive the Independent along with the Meservey section.

The publisher hopes that the combining of the two papers will be of benefit to both the towns, and that the heartiest co-operation will be received from both places, thus enabling the Independent to give more and better service both to readers and advertisers.

The Independent expects to publish the first combination of the two papers on the 6th of October. It will be some time before things can be squared around, the plant at Meservey disposed of, and other arrangements completed.

The Independent offers its readers after the first of October, the most news, from the nearest to home, and its advertisers the largest circulation, from the nearest to home, and intends to improve in all ways the columns of the paper so that the Independent will become what the publisher has always hoped to make it: A Real Home Newspaper for Real Home Folks.

An outdoor affair had been planned but this was vetoed by the weathher. Be'ng all good sports they simply changed their base of operations and proceeded as before.

The lunch and hot coffee were served cafeteria style, and following this the folks entertained themselves with music, games and dancing.

All of which indicates that harmony and good fellowsh'p prevail at the county seat of government, which is as it should be.

THE CONTRAST BETWEEN EDITORS AND DOCTORS

A little boy was given the stunt by his teacher to write an essay on editors and here is his result:

"If an editor makes a mistake folks say that he ought to be hung; but if a doctor makes a mistake he bur'es it and people dassent say nothing because doctors can read and write Latin. When the editor makes a mistake there is a lawsuit and a big fuss; but if the doctor makes one there is a funeral, cut flowers and perfect silence. A doctor can use a word a yard long without anybody knowing what it means, but if the ed'tor uses one he has to spell it. If the doctor goes to see another man's wife he charges for the visit, but if the editor goes he gets a load of buckshot. When the doctor gets drunk it's a case of being overcome by the heat and if he dies it's from heart trouble; when an editor gets drunk it's a case of too much booze and if he dies it's the jim-jams. Any college can make a doctor; an ed'tor has to be born.

JOHNNY GET YOUR GUN THE DUCKS ARE FLYIN'

You can tote your double-barrel or repeater anywhere you want to now, providing you have a license, and provided you only shoot the right kind of birds.

You have to know just what to shoot. A glimpse at the Iowa Fish and Game law book for 1921-22 issued by the state fish and game warden, W. E. Albert, will enlighten a cons'derable number of Belmond folks who do not know that they cannot shoot anything they want to.

You cannot shoot turtle doves, prair-
The Wood duck is a trifle larger than the Bluebill, is quite tame and easily approached, and there is no open season on this bird.

The Eider duck is another bird which it is against the law to shoot and upon which there is no open season. Shooting this bird is penalized by a fine.

You canot shoot turtle doves, prarie chickens or qua'l without getting yourself into hot water. The latter bird may not be shot until the first of November, 1927. Gray or fox squirrels may be shot after September 1st this year. The law prohibits the shooting of wild fowl between sunset and sunrise.

And, knowing, th's, if the hunter sees a duck, whether old Sol is out of bed or just gone, he's going to shoot away just the same most of the time, and trust to luck that if he gets the bird that it will be one of the right kind.

NEW STYLES IN PAPER MONEY

It is said the government will soon radically change the form of its paper money, which has remained unaltered almost since the foundation of the republic. Economy is the primary reason for the change. The paper which is now being used, because of a ecret process in the possession of the Crane Paper Mill, is only obtainable at a high cost. The new bills will be about three-fourths the size of those now in use, it is reported.

MAKE PURCHASERS SIGN FOR CIGARETTES

Dealers who handle cigarettes are having considerable trouble the country over in determining whether the purchaser of the pills is a minor or not. Dealers in some localities are getting around this difficulty by having slip printed on which the purchaser, concerning whost age the dealer is in doubt, is required to state that he is 21 years or over, and sign the statement. This relieves the dealer of a considerable part of the responsib'lity.

PEAT BED AT EAGLE GROVE IS BURNING

A peat bed on a farm near Eagle Grove caught fire during July, when the weather was extra hot, and in the dry weather secured a fine start and is reported burning yet. The peat bed covers about ten acres and this year the ground had been in hay when the fire started. Furrows have been plowed around the field in the hope of preventing the fire from spreading. Peat beds are reported as having been common in that vicinity before a system of dra'nage was evolved.

THROTTLE THE KIDS

Corwith Hustler:You may talk of the nuisance of running autos with the cutouts open but the noise they make is mus'c compared with the ear splitting noise ond racket caused by the iron-wheeled coasting wagons on the sidewalks. There is an ordinance forbidding this nuisance yet these coasters are perm'tted to chase up and down the streets without any regard to the rights of pedestrians or those who desire quiet in front of their homes. It has gotten to be that people have to get off the walks and give these wagons the right of way. Why not stop this nuisance along with some of the others that are even less annoying?

Too many articles like the above get into pr nt. It gives the child the impression that the world is all wrong—that mankind is unjust. He feels like the man without a country and without friends. There is no sphere wherein he is perm'tted to bestow his pent-up energy. We older folks complain, and continue to complain, but suggest not. It is true that a coaster wagon is trying to the upset nerves of a man or woman after the day's toil but it affords untold joy to the kid who is the proud possessor of one and we're for the kids, first, last and all the time. If the kid cannot coast on the s'dewalk where may he coats? Most certainly he would be taking his life in his hands to attempt to use the streets. Instead of making it a punishable crime to use a coaster wagon on the sidewalk why not pass ordinances prohibiting a dealer selling a coaster without it be equipped with rubber tires. The kid could then have his fun and folks with nerves could lean back in the old arm chair clasped in the warm rays of a golden sunset and dream of their yesterdays, and the world would seem brighter and the kid's heart would be lighter as he silently glided along disturbing no one in his pleasantry. If we can make and enforce cutout and headlight laws we can make and enforce rubber-tired coaster laws.—Kanawha Reporter.

WOMAN FIRES AT BULL— HITS HER HUSBAND

Firing a shotgun to frighten away an angry bull which had driven her husband to the top of a corn crib for safety, Mrs. W. B. Johnson of near Cresco, Iowa, inflicted wounds on her husband which, however, were not fatal. The bull had chased Johnson, who climbed on the crib to escape, and then the animal refused to leave that immediate vicinity. The man called his wife, who came with the shotgun. She aimed and fired, and hit what she wasn't aiming at, a goodly portion of the shot lodging in her husband's anatomy.

OUR INCREASED CIRCULATION

The Independent, beginning the first of October, will offer to its advertisers an increase of over two hundred circulation, or in all, pract cally eleven hundred.

The Independent guarantees that this circulation is ninety per cent local, within a trading radius of 15 miles of Belmond.

It guarantees that this circulation, s bona fide, actual subscriptions, no gifts, samples or dead copies.

Since the publisher began editing the Independent, it has been his ambition to secure a circulation of a thousand, and with the first of October this ambtiion w.ll have been realized, and over. To any newspaper, circulation is the first objective; upon it depends its advertising and its financial success. If a publisher can go to an advertiser and say that he has a c rculation of so many if that is a large number for hi territory it carries weight, for the first essential to an advertiser is the number of people he eaches thru his advertising.

The Independent offers this, and bes des that offers a circulation that is 90 per cent local, a circulation in the territory where the local merchant does business, where he expects his advertising to draw trade. A circulation that is 25 to 50 per cent "foreign," wh ch is beyond the trade boundries of the home merchant, is not a circulation which is going to bring much results from local advertising.

The advertiser in the Independent will be g'ven a larger circulation of a more result-bringing kind than he has heretofore had, and the publisher hopes that the Independent advertisers will take advantage of it. The increased circulation—the largest that has ever been offered by any newspaper in the town of Belmond, is the r direct gain.

You reach more people nearer to home thru the Independent than thru any other newspaper. Tell them what you have to sell thru the columns of the Independent, the safest, quickest, surest and cheapest way.

IS GRAVEL THE ROAD ANSWER?

Of late there has been more or less agitation on the subject of graveled roads being the answer to the road question. The plea has been made, and seems to be gaining ground steadily, that gravel is the logical answer, that paving is too expensive and lasts no longer.

It looks as tho the gravel enthusiastists have the better side of the argument. There can be l ttle question but what the gravel is cheaper, the main argument is on the ultimate cost, the lasting, and the upkeep. The gravel men say that any road can be graveled into as good shape as it can be paved, that it is not only cheaper to put on, but that it is cheaper to maintain, that it is cheaper to repair, and will last as long as paving..

It would seem that they have pretty good argument there. That it is easier to gravel, and cheaper, no-one will question. Nine out of every ten motorists will say that they prefer a good graveled road to a long stretch of pavement any time. And any good graveled road is one that will be dry and smooth after the heaviest of rains.

There are so many roads in the country wh ch are not main roads, but which are largely traveled and which should receive practically as much attention, that the problem of paving them all is beyond the question; the American farmer has too many other ways for his money—when he can get any—to force any large paving tax on him. The roads going by his land can be graveled at a great deal smaller cost than they can be paved, will g've as good satisfaction and last as long, with a cheaper upkeep. That is the plea of the gravel advocates. And it would seem that they have a pretty strong argument.

Lyceum Program Planned for Winter

The people of Rowan during the coming winter season are to be favored with a lyceum program. The contract was signed when conditions were slightly better than they are now and nothing but a hearty co-operation on the part of the public will prevent the guarantors from becoming involved in a financial sacrifict. We need a "long pull" and a "pull together" to put this thing across w'thout a financial deficit. The saving factor will be the fine program which will be as follows:

School Notes

Remember the community meeting next Friday night. Everyone is invited to come. This is to be a meeting in which the parents may get acquainted with the teachers. There will be a fine program given and light refreshments will be :erved.

The new fire escape which was being put up on the north side of the school building is completed. This is a decided improvement and one that was much needed.

Several pupils have been absent from school the past week on account of sickness.

Mr. Moule called at the school last Fr'day.

The school is progressing nicely. Let each one co-operate with the teachers to make this the best year in the history of the school. Teachers cannot make a good school if the parents are not back of them.

Wilbur J. Payne, field manager for The Country Gentleman called at the school Monday of this week.

Miss Nellie Hackley is learning the work at the switch board in the telephone office.

Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

People think they are pretty smart, but the clairvoyants continue to find rlenty of raw material to work on. Raw is right.

It never rains but it pours!

IT WAS "company night."
BUT WHEN I got home.
I FOUND the Browns.
HAD A sick baby.
AND COULDN'T come.
SO I chortled "Oh, joy.
WON'T SUE and I have.
SWELL EATS for two!"
BUT NO, Sue said.
"YOU DON'T suppose.
I'D WASTE all this food.
JUST ON you!"
AND SO I said.
"LET'S PHONE the Smiths."
BUT THEY had headaches.
THEN WE tried the Joneses.
AND THEY fell for it.
AND WHEN grub for four.
WAS JUST about ready.
THE PHONE bell tinkled.
AND THE Brown baby was better.
AND A minute later.
THE SMITHS changed their mind.
AND THE Missus fainted.
"OH, WELL," I said.
"THE MORE the merrier.
WHAT'S THE difference?
IF THERE isn't enough food.
I'LL FEED the males.
ON THE cigarettes that satisfy.
AND YOU women can talk.
AND BETWEEN the two.
WE'LL ALL be Satisfied."

SOMEBODY'S BEEN SMOKIN' HOP

An exchange tells of an artist who painted a dog so natural that the animal had hydrophobia during the hot weather. He's the same man who painted a copy of a beer bottle with such skill that the cork flew out just as he was finishing it. After he was married he painted a picture of a child so lifelike that it cried, and his wife spanked it before she discovered her mistake.—Exchange.

The same fellow probably painted a beefsteak that looked so natural his wife cooked it by mistake—and he never knew the difference.

MRS. MARY GOODRIDGE

Mary Wilson was born April 9, 1879 and departed this life Sept. 18, 1921, at the home of her mother, Mrs. Mark Wilson at the age of 42 years 5 months and 9 days. She had been sick about nine months. She was born at Albany, Missouri, and 9 years later she moved with her parents to Iowa, near Belmond, where she spent a part of her childhood days. Later she moved to Twin Lake, Iowa. Belmond Local News

Of course, anyone who resides in Belmond or the immediate vicinity, is fully aware that we have been enjoying (?) a damp spell the past week. But to those readers outside let us say that there has been some rain recently. For two months in the summer it was a safe bet at five to one that it wouldn't rain; the past week it has been equally safe to bet that it would. It doesn't even have to try, it rains without trying, often and frequent. Thursday night of last week it rained the hardest that this vicinity has seen for many a day, with the gutters running over with water. It ought to be fine weather for ducks, altho the hunters say the ducks are few and far between.

Howard Wolle left last week Wednesday night for Sioux City, where he has resumed his old job with the telephone company of that place. Howard recently returned from Honduras, Central America, where he was employed for three months this summer with the Dyer company, who were constructing a cane sugar factory at that place.

In this issue will be found the bank statements. We said that last week, but we sort of went absent minded and left them out, which was a very bright idea, to say the least.

In another column will be found a county drainage notice, which will be of interest to those farmers who reside west of town.

F. Luick, regarding the matter.

According to reports, a local young man was the victim of a forger on the Fourth of July, and he has just discovered the fact. He celebrated the day at the county seat, and while there someone wrote a check for a trifle over twenty-one dollars, signed his name to it, and cashed the same. Recently the young man got his cancelled checks from the bank here, and his wife, going over them, noticed the forgery and asked him what he had given a check fo that amount for. He said he hadn't, and then he found that somebody had stung him.

Chas. Peterson of Hampton drew a very large crowd to a musical comedy he staged at the Winsdor theatre at that place last Friday. The show was extensively advertised, and the house was reported filled. A few of the Belmond folks went over to see the play and to visit with Charley, who is an old Belmond citizen.

The Des Moines Register carried a picture in its Sunday edition which it said was Belmond. However, the microscope failed to detect the slightest point that looked like Belmond. It was a nice looking little town, but it wasn't Belmond, nor anything like Belmond. The question is, what town was it?

The hunting season has opened, and many are the Nimrods faring forth to Morse Lake and the Twins. Reports of their luck seem to indicate that the ducks are few and far between this year, or else that they have not started migrating from the north as yet. Very few birds are being shot around here. One local hunter was out all night, in one of the worst of the recent rains, and got five ducks for his trouble.

Coming to the opera house Saturday night, Sept. 24th, a high class vaudeville show will play at our local opera house on that date. The three acts they will present are not only of the finest type but are very clean and full of fun. Mr. Snyder being the second Canadian ace of the World War, has been requested to tell some of his thrilling experiences in shooting down the 21 aeroplanes to his credit. Mr. Chalk is full of blackface jokes in the real colored brogue. Mr. Johns with his violin has been making a big hit in all the nearby towns where they have played. This looks like a real treat for they have been booked here because they have a few days off the big time where they have made a great success in the large cities. Don't fail to see this fine bill. The break in the lights last week was due to a break in the power line near Rowan. The lightning struck a switch near that place, and it was some time before the linemen got it fixed. Talking of this with Lineman Luick of the company, he told of a case near Rowan last spring when the power line broke, the wire falling to the ground. He stated that where the wire hit the ground, there was a round hole burned into the ground for a distance of three to four feet, and from that down another hole went down to a depth which he could not blumb. The dirt about the hole was turned into a sort of glass from the extremely intense heat from the high voltage of the line, and was as smooth and hard and glazed as a piece of glass. It may be alright for those who want to, to monkey around with a high-voltage line, but it doesn't appeal to us. not when it turns dirt into glass, at any rate.

Henry Steinlicht, who recently moved to a farm near Kanawha, writes that he is nicely settled and beginning to like farm life again. He also states that he had an argument with a Kanawha fan over the respective merits of the ball teams of the two towns. Season's over Henry; let 'em alone

American Farm Bureau Federation Backs Legistlation to Aid Agriculture

When congress recessed on August 24, after an almost continuous session since April 11, it had to it credits more agricultural legislation than has been passed in a like period by any congress since the gravel first fell in the Old State House in Philadelphia. The members of the Agricultural blocks in senate and house, headed by Senator W. S. Kenyons and Representative L. J. Dickinson, have returned to their states feeling that they have been the authors of constructive legislation which will afford agriqulture real relief.

The American Farm Bureau Federation, working very closely with both the senate and house agricultural blocks, has been back of each bill passed. The bills as finally signed by the president do not in each instance represent the federation's ideal, but they represent constructive achievement on behalf of the farmer.

No less than seven bills, all of outstanding interest to agriculture have been signed resently by President Harding. They are listed as follows: 1. The packer and stockyards control measure. 2. Regulation of grain charges and future trading of grain. 3. .Extenison of War Finance Corporation's powers to lend money to facilitates exportation of agricultural products. 4. Increasing the rate of interest on federal farm loan bonds from 5 to 5 and one half per cent 5. Increasing by $25,000,000 the working captal of the farm l oan system. 6 Limiting immigration to 2 per cent of the forgein born residents in this country as recorded in the 1910 census. 7. The emergency tariff bill.

The president recently signed the deficiency appropriation bill providing $200,000 for administration of the new packer control bill which was made a law on August 19. The American Farm Bureau Federation actively suported this packer legislation, which provides for the regulation of both the packers and stockyards by the secretary of Agriculture. Secretary Wallace believes that an organization 116 people will be required to administer the law. The salary of the chief packer control official is limited to$5,000.

The Capper-Tincher grain marketing control bill, which also received the support of the farm bureau, is another regulatory measure which will be under administration in wheat and other grains by placing the grain excanges under his direction. The secretary will license these exchanges and the licenses will be revoked if the exchanges violate the regulation for trading in grain promulgated by him. The bill places a prohibitive tax on all future sales unless they are made on a market designated by the secretary as a "contract market." It also seeks to curb speculative operation on any market but will premit an individual or firm to "hedge" to the extent of 1,000,000 bushels. A board of appeals is provided in the bill, to consist of the secretary of agriculture, secretary of commerce and the attorney general.

In floating its next issue of federal farm loan bonds, which are exempt from taxes, the federal farm loan board should be materially assisted by the two bills which have recently become laws. One bill provides for a revolving fund of $25,000,000 in the treasury department which will be used by the federal farm loan board as an additional working capital and the other makes it possible to pay 5 and one half per cent on bonds—one half more than they have borne heretofore. This increased interest rate, however, does not increase the rate charged to the borrower of the money under the federal farm loan system, which remains at 6 per cent.

Farm Bureau Picnic at Wall Lake

Lincoln and Wall Lake townships will picnic Friday, September 23rd. A meeting of representatives from Lincoln and Wall Lake townships met at the Wall Lake community church last Tuesday night, Sept. 13, to plan and organize a joint picnic which is to be staged Friday Sept. 23rd, beginning at 10 a. m.

Joint committees consisting of members from both townships were appointed to make plans for the top. No program has been announced as yet but the program committee promises a good lively program with something doing every minute.

The following committee members were appointed:

Program committee: Miss Nesse Howieson, Wall Lake; Glen State, Lincoln.

Athletic committee: Ed Smith, Wall Lake; Will Tillman, Lincoln; Ralph Kenyon, Wall Lake; Herb. Morrow, Wall Lake.

Finance committee: Fred Soults, Lincoln; Duane Richardson, Wall Lake; P. J. McHale, Wall Lake; Will Meyers, Wall Lake.

Arrangements are being made to secure an outside speaker from the state farm bureau federation office. An effort is being made to secure Mr. A. J.Shinn, of Woodbine, Iowa, who gave the principle address at the Dows community picnic a few weeks ago. Mr. Shinn is a progressive farmer who owns and is actually operating half a section of land in Harrison county. He is a very fluent speaker and a man who has made a special study of the farm bureau and its relation to the Iowa farmer and he will, no doubt, have a messege for every farmer who has the opportunity to hear him.

Farm Bureau Business Meetings

A meeting is being held in each township in Wright county for the purpose of presenting real facts regarding the farm bureau as a county, state, and national organization.

Every farmer in Wright county, regardless of whether or not he is a member of the farm bureau is earnestly urged to attend one of these meetings to hear about what is being done by the farm bureau for each farmer and for agriculture in general. Girl's Club Active

The girls of Lincoln township met at the home of Mrs. Anna Overbaugh Saturday afternoon, Sept. 3d, and organized what is to be known as the "Lincoln Learning Lassies" club. The following officers were elected: president, Edith Waddell; vice-president, Edna Pohlman; secretary-treasurer, Marjorie Soults; club reporter, Madelyn Russel.

Mrs. Isel Matson has been kind enough to offer her services as township club leader and the girls are looking forward with a great deal of pleasure to the splendid times they are going to have and the things which they are going to learn under her leadership.

Madelyn Russell, Club Reporter.

The Wall Lake Willing Workers had a most enjoyable meeting at the home of Myrl Mosher Monday, Sept. 5th.

The afternoon was spent in sewing and carrying on a regular business of the club, after which delightful refreshments were served. One visitor was present at this meeting. The next meeting of the Willing Workers will be held at the home of Marguerite McHale.

Right Payment

Nine-year-old Charles carried letters from the lawyer next door to his best girl. Every time he took one the lawyer gave him a dime.

But one day he decided to reward him a little better. He started to fish two dimes out of his pocket. "I guess these two letters are worth 20 cents," he remarked facetiously.

"Yes, sir," Charles agreed, soberly, "thats what I get—a dime from you and one from her."

But he didn't know what there was about his speech to make the fellow grin so happily.

A soft answer won't turn away the wrath of a bulldog.

A reasonable price doesn't seem to help much when one is broke.

FARMERS DEMAND CUT IN FREIGHT RATES

A proposal that the railroads reduce freight rates on grain and hay 25 per cent and that railroad labor agree to accept a cut of 5 per cent in wages to make the rate reduction possible was submitted by Clifford Thorne, of Chicago, general councel for the American Farm Bureau federation, in argument before the interstate commerce commission today in the grain and hay rate investigation.

After declaring that after every great war a period of decline in prices has inevitably developed and that in the struggle to prevent the lowering of charges the agricultural industry must reduce costs to the pre-war level.

Thorne's Proposition

"I beleive that railroad labor might probably oppose any further decrease in wages that would go to the railroad corporations," he said, "but on the other hand, I should like to submit the following proposition:

"If labor is assured that the entire wage decrease would accrue to the farmer, what would be its attitude?

"During these proceedings we have heard railroad officials continually stating that rates cannot come down unless wages are reduced. I desire to ask this question: If railroad labor shall consent to a reduction in wages for the specific purpose named, will you consent to the reduction in the rates on grain?"

Mr. Thorne submitted estimates to show that a five percent decrease in wages would premit a twenty-five per cent reduction in freight rates on grain and hay.

Counsel for the roads present said obviously they could not reply to the question. Thorne asserted that the vice president of one important western railroad approved the proposition.

Freight Burden Heavy

"The conditions in the agricultural industry are intolerable," asserted Thorne, "and oneof the principal factors helping to produce this situation is the excessive transportation burden resting upon agriculture. And yet the railroads claim they are not making what the law allows, and they say they cannot consent to any reduction in rates without a reduction in wages. On the other hand, railroad labor is thoroughly opposed to any reduction in wages. There is a controversy as to which tribunal has jurisdiction over the combined issues—how far the authority of the interstate commerce commision goes and how far the jursdiction of the labor board goes. With these conflicting factors it is difficult to find a common ground upon which we can all agree."

To reduce freight rates on grain, grain products and hay without a reducting in operating expenses would be "disastrous" to the rail roads in view of their present financial condition and would throw "many if not a majority, of the western carriers into bankruptcy," while no substantial relief would be afforded the farmers, J. N. Davis, of Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railroad, declared in his argument.

The unform success that has attended the use of Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy in the relief and cure of bowel complaints, both children and adults, has brought it to almost universal use, so that it is practically without a rival and as everyone who has used it knows, it is without an equal.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

No Subsitute Offered.

Say what you will about druggists offering something "just as good" because it pays a better profit, the fact still stands that ninety-nine out of a hundred druggists recommend Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy, when the best medicine for diarrhoea is asked for, and do so because they know from what their customers say of it, that it can be depended upon.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

Ah, the skirts are all right—as far as they go.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

Within ten more minutes, every man of the Morelands was gathered there at the house of their chief—and every man of them had lost their weapons during the night!

John Moreland called Dale aside and said to him:

"You're high on the good side o' them thar triflin' Hecks, and, so fer as they know, you ain't int'rested in the feud. I wisht you'd go down thar and see By and his mother, and see ef ye can find out whar our rifles went."

When Dale had gone off down the dusty oxwagon road, Caleb Moreland climbed a tall ash that grew behind his father's cabin and kept a watch toward the Littleford side of the river. He saw a group of men standing in Ben Littleford's cabin yard, and nothing else.

A little more than a quarter of an hour after Dale left John Moreland he entered by the gateless gateway at the cabin of the Hecks. It was a dilapidated place, and it stood not far from the river. By sat in the front doorway; he was lazily cutting a new midday sun mark in the place of the worn old one. Behind him sat his mother, who was busily knitting a gray yarn stocking.

The moonshiner looked up and started quickly to his feet.

"Hi, thar, Bill, old boy!" he greeted cordially. "My gosh, but ye've come at the right time, shore. We're a-goin' to have young squirrels fo' dinner, and a b'iled hamshank with string beans, and cawnbread made with the yeller o' hen aigs. Live whilst ye do live, says I. Come right in, Bill, old boy."

"La, la, la!" cried Granny Heck, looking over the brass rims of her spectacles. "How glad I am to see ye, Mr. Bill! Come right in and tell us the news."

Bill Dale crossed the threshold and accepted a creaking chair. His eyes took in at a sweeping glance the home-made dining table with its cover of red oilcloth, the broken cast-iron stove, the strings of dried peppers hanging on the log walls, the broken stillworm lying in the corner.

"The Littlefords," said Dale, "have declared war."

"Sakes!" laughed the old woman. "We knowed that last night when we heered them ten shots."

"And all the Moreland rifles are missing." Dale watched the effect of his words.

"What!" the Hecks cried in one voice.

Their surprise seemed genuine. Dale pressed the subject further and learned only that if they knew anything concerning the disappearance of the rifles they were not going to tell. Then he started homeward by way of the pool above the blown-down sycamore.

There was a chance that Ben Littleford's daughter would be there fishing, Dale told himself, and it was barely possible that she could throw some light on the mystery of the rifles.

He crossed the river by means of the prostrate tree. Babe was there; she sat on the stone on which she had been sitting the morning before; her back was to him, and her bare feet were in the water to her ankles. Dale went up close, stopped and gathered a handful of violets and dropped them over her shoulder and into her lap.

Babe looked around and smiled.

"What luck, Miss Littleford?"

"Nothin'. I don't much want to ketch anything," she said slowly, a spirit of sadness in her musical voice. "I—I jest come off down here to be whar it's quiet. You ought to hear the noise 'at pap and the rest of 'em is a-makin!"

Dale narrowed his eyes. "Are they—er, making a noise? And what about?"

"My goodness gracious alive! You'd think so ef ye could hear 'em! Y'ought to hear pap cuss John Moreland!" She shrugged her pretty shoulders, lifted the small end of her rod to its proper place, and went on. "I never did see pap half as mad as he was when he got home last night from a-follerin' me."

"Mad at you?" asked Dale.

"Mad at You?" Asked Dale.

"No; but he would ha' been ef he hadn't ha' had all his madness turned ag'in them Morelands. You knowed about pap's trouble on yan side o' the river last night?"

"Yes, I knew about that," Dale answered slowly. "But John Moreland thought your father was my antagonist of yesteray."

"An—antagonist?" Babe muttered inquiringly. "What's that?"

"I mean Adam Ball, y'know."

"Oh. That's what I told pap. But pap he wouldn't believe it, and he won't never believe it—'cause he don't want to believe it. I told him 'at John Moreland wasn't a-shootin' to hit, and he wouldn't believe that, neither. Pap's as hard-headed as a brindle cow, when he gits a fool notion on him. What—what did them Morelands say about their guns a-bein' gone?"

Dale straightened.

"How did you find that out?"

"Don't matter how!" She smiled almost saucily. "I knowed about it afore you did, Mr. Bill Dale. Don't you think whoever done it done a kind thing?"

"To disarm the Morelands so that when the enemy comes they will have nothing with which to defend themselves?" Dale didn't know much about these hill feuds. "No, Miss Littleford, I can't say that I think it was a kind thing to do."

Miss Littleford arose and faced Dale. Her cheeks were flushed.

"Has the inemy come?" she demanded icily.

"No, but—"

"All right," the young woman broke in sharply. "If the inemy hain't come, what're you a-kickin' about?"

Her brown eyes were full of fire. They defied, and they withered, and Bill Dale suddenly felt that he was smaller and of less account in the scheme of things than that uneducated, wildly superb creature that stood before him.

"I beg pardon," Dale said evenly. "I didn't mean to offend, y'know."

His quick contrition struck the girl. Her mouth quivered. She dropped her fishing-rod, and began to toy absently with the end of her long, thick plait of brown hair.

"I've seed so much o' this fightin'," she murmured tremulously, "that it makes me go to pieces. I ought to beg yore pardon, mebbe, and I d-do. . . . I've seed a good many fine, strong men brought home dead or a-dyin' from the Moreland bullets. And the Littlefords has killed Morelands, too. One side about as many as t'other, I reckon. I'd be glad to give my life to stop it!"

"I'll help you, if I can," Dale told her. "Perhaps we can make friends of the Morelands and your people."

"You don't know what a hard thing it'd be," she replied tearfully. "The two sets has hated each other ever sence I can rickollect. And you won't be here very long, I reckon."

"I may be here for the rest of my life," said Dale.

"Is it the coal?" inquired Babe.

"Partly—yes, it's the coal. I'm going to develop it for the Morelands."

Babe looked at him with a tiny herald of hope in her eyes. Before she could speak again there came from somewhere back in the meadow the sound of her father's voice—

"Babe! O-oh, Babe!"

"Comin'!" cried the girl, half turning. "We'll try to make 'em friends; we'll try. Old Major Bradley, he'll be up here afore long to spend the summer, and he'll help us. He's a mighty good man; you're shore to like him. He gen'ally stays with us when he's here. You go easy with John Moreland! But when ye git him, ye'll have 'em all. I'll work on pap. The' ain't no danger o' trouble right now, anyways. Goodby, Bill Dale!"

"One moment, Miss Littleford," and he took a step after her. "Are you sure there's no danger right now?"

Babe halted, faced about nervously, and smiled a little.

"Don't call me 'Miss' no more," said she. "It makes me feel old. Call me what everybody else calls me, ef ye don't mind. Why, every one o' the Littlefords lost their rifles last night the same as the Morelands did! Meet me here at sundown, and I'll tell ye about it. Goodby, Bill Dale!"

"Goodby, Babe!" he smiled.

CHAPTER V.

At the River Again.

John Moreland met Dale at the gate.

"What did ye find out?"

"I learned," was the answer, "that the Littlefords all lost their guns just as the Morelands did."

"The devil!"

The mountaineers began to crowd about Dale.

"And who," asked their leader, "do ye think done it?"

Bill Dale shook his head slowly and threw out his hands.

"How should I know?" He went on: "Babe told me about the Littleford guns disappearing. I saw her down at the river; she was fishing."

"Did she say anything," pursued John Moreland, "'at sounded like she knowed whar them guns went to?"

"She told me," said Dale, "she would give her life to stop the fighting. She seemed rather badly worked up over it."

From the cabin's front doorway came a woman's sorrowful voice:

"And me, too; I'd give my life to stop this here fightin'. I had a boy, a big, strappin' boy—"

John Moreland frowned toward his wife and interrupted, "Now, Addie, honey, don't do that."

It ended the talk.

Mrs. Moreland dried her eyes on a corner of her freshly ironed gingham apron, and announced the noonday meal. The mountaineers dispersed. Grandpap Moreland went away clawing at his long white beard and grumbling over the loss of his beloved old Lancaster.

An hour later Dale cornered the Moreland leader on the vine-hung front porch and suggested that they look over the coal property that afternoon. He was eager to go to work, eager to be doing something worth while, he told Moreland. The hillman stood very still for what seemed to the other a very long time, and had no word to say. Evidently the feud had all his mind now.

When he did speak, he said simply: "All right, Bill."

After half an hour of fighting their way through thickets of blooming laurel and ivy, they drew up before an old and mildewed cabin at the north end of David Moreland's mountain. Moreland led the way in and pointed to a spot under a small, paneless window.

"Thar," said he, "is whar we found my brother David."

The two men turned for the point at which the coal vein ran out to the light of day.

Dale picked up a piece of the shining black stuff. Judging by the little he knew and the great amount of description he had heard, the vein was very large and the coal itself of the finest grade.

"It was a big find," he told his companion, "a big find. It was a pity to let it lie here untouched for so long; and yet it's worth more today than it was ever worth before."

His enthusiasm ran warm, and Moreland caught it quickly. Together they hastily planned out the little railroad that was to wind its way through the wilds and connect with the big railroad at the Halfway switch.

"I know I'm a-doin' right about it," the mountaineer said twice for the benefit of his conscience. "I know pore David he would want me to do this ef he could know."

"I'm sure of it," agreed Dale. "I'll start for Cincinnati tomorrow. I've got enough money to take me there and back. I have a very wealthy friend there—his name is Harris; I think I can borrow enough from him to finance the beginning of this thing. And I'll buy a locomotive and cars, and all the other necessary machinery, while I'm in Cincinnati—unless I fail to get the money from Harris. When I get back, which should be within eight days, we'll start the work. At a guess, I'd say we'll need twenty men. Can we get them?"

"Shore," nodded the mountaineer. "And all Morelands at that."

They turned homeward. At last Bill Dale was happy. He had something to do now—an aim in life. He had difficulties to overcome, obstacles to remove, barriers to surmount—it was his big chance!

* * * * * * * *

It was almost sundown when Dale returned from his visit to the coal vein—Big Pine mountain hid the sun at a little after three in the afternoon. He borrowed a fishing rod and a minnow pail, which made his going to the river seem proper enough to John Moreland, and set out to meet Babe Littleford. He was glad that nobody expressed a desire to accompany him.

He found Ben Littleford's daughter where he had found her twice before—sitting on a stone the size of a small barrel. She was fishing with an unbaited hook, which was equal to fishing not at all, and she seemed pleased when she saw him coming. He sat down on the stone at her side. She moved over a little shyly, and tried to cover her feet with her calico skirts.

"Needn't bother to hide them," laughed Bill Dale. "They're pretty enough. Most feet, y'know, are necessary evils, like chimneys and rainspouts!"

Babe Littleford blushed. He went on, to hide her confusion, "Tell me about the rifles."

"You must shore keep it a secret," she told him.

"I promise."

"Better put yore hook in, so's ef anybody comes along—"

Dale threw out an empty hook.

"I want to tell ye some other things fust, so's ye'll onderstand better when I come to the part about the rifles," Babe began, looking thoughtfully across the water to where a kingfisher sat in watchful waiting. She continued slowly, choosing her words carefully. "I was brought up to hate them Morelands, but—I don't think I do. My people is jest like the Morelands. The biggest difference ye can find is that one side mostly has grey eyes like you and t'other side mostly has brown eyes like me. All but their everlastin' fightin', they're good people, Bill Dale.

"Each side, ye see, is brought up to hate t'other side. I'm ashamed to tell it, but—I onderstand the fust plain words my Uncle Saul Littleford's last baby said was these here: 'D—n John Moreland!' It started a long time ago, and it started over nothin'. Grandpap Littleford and John Moreland's pap got in a dispute over whether Kaintucky was in Virginny or Nawth Ca'liner, and went to fightin' about it. Purty soon my Uncle Saul and Abner Moreland happened along, and they went to fightin', too. Thank goodness, it was on Sunday, and none of 'em didn't have their rifles with 'em. Whatever else we are or ain't up here, Bill Dale, we gen'ally respects the Sabbath day to keep it holy. . . ."

"I see," Dale muttered sympathetically.

"I've seen my own mother set down in the floor and take her boy's head in her lap—oh, such a big, fine boy he was!—while the blood run through her dress from a Moreland's bullet. He died with mother's arms and mine around him. It was all we could do fo' him, was to love him. I've seen sisters watch their brothers die from Moreland bullets, and young wimmen watch their sweethearts die, and wives watch their husbands die. . . . .

"I tell you, Bill Dale, them Morelands never misses when they have even half a fair shot. You'd be pufectly safe in a-lettin' any of 'em shoot dimes from atween yore finger and thumb all day. And it's the same way with the Littlefords. They're fighters, too, every one, and they don't give in any more than the Morelands does.

"Addie Moreland knows what it is to take her dyin' boy's head in her lap, whilst blood run through her dress to her knees. His name was Charley, and he was bad; he'd drink, and oncet he shot up Cartersville. But Addie, she allus loved him better'n Cale or Luke. Wimmen like her allus loves the worst boys the best; 'cause they need it the most, the worst boys does.

"It's the wimmen that pays, Bill Dale, when the's fightin'. The wimmen o' this valley is right now on needles; they're afeard the men'll find their rifles. You can guess whar the guns went to now, cain't ye? The wimmen hid 'em last night atter the men had gone to sleep! By good luck, they had almost a whole night fo' it. You must be shore to keep it to yourself—but I know ye will. Addie Moreland, she started the idee. She got Granny Moreland to spread the word amongst the wimmen o' my people. When the fightin' fever sort o' dies down the guns'll all be brought back and put whar they belong."

She arose and stood there smiling down upon him. He was staring at the swirling water without seeing it at all.

Her voice brought him to himself.

"What're you a-thinkin' about, Bill Dale?"

Dale went to his feet. He saw that she was smiling, and he smiled, too.

"I was thinking," he said, "of the difference between you and some other women I know."

Her clear brown eyes widened. "And I reckon I seem purty no 'count, don't I?"

"No, not at all. It is—er, quite the opposite, Babe. You make them appear unreal, artificial."

Babe Littleford's countenance brightened. She did not doubt that he meant it. He was not of the sort that flattered. She began to like Bill Dale at that same moment.

And Bill Dale told himself as he went homeward that he was beginning to like Babe Littleford. He did not fight the feeling, because it somehow made the world seem a better place.

Early the following morning Dale made ready for his journey to Cincinnati. Having learned the evening before that he was going, By Heck had come to accompany him to the Halfway switch.

The two set out. They had three hours in which to cross David Moreland's mountain before the arrival of Dale's train, and they walked leisurely.

They had not gone a dozen rods when there came from somewhere down near the river the sound of a rifle shot. Both stopped and faced about quickly.

"I'll be dadgummed ef the Littlefords ain't found their weepons!" exclaimed By Heck. "They have, igod, as shore as dangit!"

"How do you know?" Dale's voice was troubled.

"I shore know," and Heck narrowed his gaze. "'At was Ben Littleford's old .45 Winch. I'd know that gun ef I heered it at the nawth pole. The bar'l it's been cut off, and it don't sound like other Winchesters."

"Caleb Moreland was down near the river cleaning out the springhouse ditch," Dale muttered, facing his companion. "I think we'd better go back."

Together they went back to the cabin. John Moreland and his wife and their son Luke were standing at the weatherbeaten front gate, with their eyes turned anxiously toward the river. Caleb was coming up through the meadow, and he carried his hat in his hand.

"Who fired that shot?" asked Dale.

"Ben Littleford," John Moreland answered readily.

Two minutes later Caleb leaped the old rail fence on the other side of the road and approached them hastily. He was breathing rapidly and his strong young face was drawn and pale—with the old hate.

"Well," said his iron father, "what is it?"

Caleb held up his broad-rimmed black hat and ran a finger through a hole in the upper part of the crown's peak.

"He didn't miss!" snapped John Moreland.

"No," quickly replied Caleb, "he didn't miss. He don't never miss. You know that, pap, as well as ye know God made ye. He done it jest to show me he meant what he said. He told me to go and tell you to gether up yore set o' rabbit-hearted heatherns and come down to the river fo' a lead-and-powder picnic, onless ye was a-skeered to come! He said to tell ye the wimmenfolks had hid our guns, and we'd find 'em onder the house floors."

John Moreland took it with utter calmness, though his face was a little pale behind his thick brown beard. He turned to his wife, who looked at him squarely.

"Addie, honey," said he, "I'm mighty sorry."

"Ef—ef you was much sorry, John," Mrs. Moreland half sobbed, "ye wouldn't go down thar to the river."

"Me a coward?" Moreland appeared to grow an inch in stature. "Me let a Littleford send me news like this here which Cale brings, and not do nothin' at all about it? I thought you knowed me better'n that, Addie."

He faced his two stalwart sons. Always he was the general, the leader of his clan. He sent Caleb in one direction and Luke in another, to arouse his kinsmen.

Then he beckoned to Dale, who had been trying hard but vainly to think of something to do or say that would be of aid to the cause of the women.

"I don't want you in this here mix-up," he said decisively. "You must stay clean out of it. You ain't used to this way o' fightin'. Asides, you're our hope. More'n that, mebbe, you owe yore life to Babe Littleford; you cain't get around that, Bill Dale."

He went on, after a moment, "Ef I git my light put out today, I want ye to do the best ye can with the coal, But o' course ye will. I want ye to do me two favors, Bill Dale, ef I have my light put out today. Will ye do 'em fo' me, my friend?"

"Certainly," Dale promised.

"Much obliged to ye, shore. The fust is this: I want ye to take good pay out o' what the coal brings, pay fo' yore work. The second is this: I want ye to go to Ben Littleford atter I'm done—pervided he is yet alive—and tell him about the end o' my bedtime prayer; I want him to know I went him one better, 'at I was a bigger man inside 'en him. Remember, Bill, you've done promised me. Now you go ahead to Cincinnaty, and do jest like ye didn't know the least thing about this trouble we're a-goin' to have. So long to ye, an' good luck!"

"I don't like the idea"—Dale began, when the big hillman interrupted sharply:

"Go on! You cain't do no good here!"

Heck started. Dale turned and followed the lanky moonshiner; there seemed to be nothing else to do.

When they had reached a point a little way above the foot of David Moreland's mountain, the pair halted and looked back. They saw the Littlefords and the Morelands, every one of them armed, going toward the river. It had a strange and subtle fascination for Bill Dale, a fascination that he did not then try to understand.

As the fighters reached dangerous ground they dropped to their hands and knees and began to crawl through the tall grasses, the ironweed and the meadow clover. They were intent upon reaching the shelter of the trees that lined the banks of the river without being seen. The stream here was more than fifty yards wide; this was Blue Cat shoals. The two lines of trees stood back a rod or so from the water, making the final shooting distance some seventy yards.

Drawled Heck: "Le's set down here and watch it; hey?"

Dale was silent. The very air was filled with the spirit of tragedy. The faroff tinkle of a cowbell seemed tragic; tragic, too, sounded the song of a bird somewhere in the tree branches overhead.

"Did ye hear me, Bill?"

"I think," Dale muttered, "that I'd better not go away until tomorrow. I can't leave matters like this. Do you know of any way to stop that down there?"

By Heck shrugged his shoulders.

"Do you know o' any way to stop the risin' and settin' o' the sun?" he grinned.

They went back to John Moreland's cabin.

* * * * * * * * *

It was altogether by accident that the Littleford chief found his weapons. He had dropped a small coin through a crack in the floor. Babe was quick to say that she would crawl under the house and look for the coin, although she had just put on a freshly laundered blue-and-white calico dress. Her anxiety showed plainly in her face. Her father questioned her sharply, and she stammered in spite of herself. Ben Littleford's suspicions were aroused.

So he came out from under the cabin floor with his hands full of the steel of rifle barrels, and with the money forgotten. He placed the rifles carefully on the floor of the porch, turned and caught his daughter by the arm.

"Who hid 'em?" he demanded gruffly.

"I hid 'em," was the ready answer, defiant and bitter—"I, me! What're you a-goin' to do about it?"

Littleford flung his daughter's arm from him. He was king, even as John Moreland was king. His keen eyes stared at the young woman's face as though they would wither it.

"What made you hide 'em?" he growled. "Say, what made ye do it?"

"To try and save human lives, 'at's why!" Babe answered. "That man from the city—what'll he think o' us a-doin' this-away, a-fightin' like crazy wildcats?"

"Ef he don't like the way we do here, he can go back home," retorted the angry mountaineer. "He ain't tied, is he?"

Babe smiled a smile that was somehow pitiful, and turned off.

"The' ain't no use in a-argyin' with you, pap," she said hopelessly. "I—I might' nigh wisht I was dead."

At that instant the gate creaked open. Babe glanced toward it and saw coming that black beast of a man, Adam Ball the Goliath, and he was armed heavily; in one hand he carried a new high-power repeating rifle, and around his great waist there was a new belt bristling with long, bright smokeless cartridges fitted with steel-jacketed bullets.

* * * * * * * *

When Dale and his companion reached the cabin, Addie Moreland met them. Anxiety was breaking her heart.

"Mr. Dale," she pleaded, "I want you to go down thar to the river and see ef the's anything ye can do to stop it afore it begins. You jest walk out bold in the open and ye won't be shot at, and I'll be obleeged to ye. Oh, I know the' ain't but one chanst in ten thousand, but I'm a-prayin' ye'll strike that one chanst."

Dale knew that he could do nothing toward bringing peace, and he knew that John Moreland would be angry at his interfering. But he nodded and went toward the river. He didn't have the heart in him to refuse.

Then there came the keen thunder of a rifle shot.

Dale halted for a moment. Between two sycamores on the nearer side of the river he saw a puff of smoke rising lazily from behind a water oak on the farther side; a Littleford had fired first. Dale went on, moving rapidly and trying to keep himself always in plain view.

Then came a puff of white smoke and a report from one of the Moreland rifles, then shots from both sides — and the battle was on. Dale heard the nasty whine of a bullet in full flight; he heard the coarse "zzz" of a half-spent ricochet. He knew that he was in some danger now, and he was surprised to find that he was not frightened.

When he halted again it was on his knees behind the big white sycamore that sheltered John Moreland.

"Back, are ye?" frowned the mountaineer. And with the grimmest humor, "I reckon ye had a fine, large time in Cincinnaty. Yore friend Harris was well, I hope. Git that money from him?"

"Cut that out," said Bill Dale. "It doesn't get us anywhere—"

A bullet threw particles of sycamore bark to his face, interrupting. John Moreland pointed to a green furrow in the side of the tree.

"Ben Littleford hisself," said Moreland. "He's ahind o' that water oak acrost thar. Don't stick yore head out!"

The mountaineer turned his gaze over Dale's shoulder, and his countenance seemed to freeze. Dale looked around quickly and saw Babe Littleford, less than ten feet behind him! She had crept up through the tall grasses and weeds. In one hand she carried a white flag made of a man's handkerchief and a willow switch. She halted and sat up.

"Babe!" Dale cried out. "What are you doing here?"

Babe gave him a pale smile. "Ef pap'd shoot me, a-thinkin' I was a Moreland, mebbe it'd stop the everlastin' fightin'," she said.

John Moreland stared, and Bill Dale stared. They were in a Presence, and they knew it. Babe went on:

"I've come to save all o' yore lives; but ef I do it, ye'll haf to make yore men quit a-fightin' right now—jest order 'em to stop a-shootin', and hold up this here—and I promise ye on a Littleford's word 'at pap'll call ye a better man 'an him 'cause ye done it—"

She tossed the white flag to him. "The' ain't no time to lose, John Moreland; hold up the flag! Ef ye don't, ye'll every one be killed, 'cause ye're every one in a trap!"

"I don't believe ye, Babe!" snapped the Moreland chief. "Yore people can hold up a white rag jest as well as we can!"

Babe went paler. There was a sudden burst of firing from the Moreland rifles, and she crept a little nearer to John Moreland in order that he might hear plainly that which she had to tell him next.

Farmers Donate Their Work To Improve Cemetery

Some Two Dozen Men Donate Teams And Labor To Gravel Roads

MAKES FINE IMPROVEMENT

Last week Thursday some twenty-five or more farmers and teamsters donated their labor and that of their teams, for the hauling of gravel to improve the roads thru and around the cemetery.

The roads thru the cemetery were graveled and fixed up in fine shape, and the entrance, and road on the south, were graded up and graveled making a fine improvement.

The ladies of the cemetery society, co-operating with the men and doing their bit to help, served the men a splendid dinner at the Earn Luick home, there being twenty-five men at the dinner.

The Belmond cemetery bears the reputation for being one of the best kept and nicest appearing cemeteries in the state, and the cemetery and all who have a part in the upkeep of the "Silent City" may well feel proud of their efforts. The recent graveling is an improvement which goes far toward making the cemetery one of the best and the thanks of the community are due to the men who donated their time and labor and the ladies who served them the dinner.

HE KNEW HIS RIGHTS—

BUT HE SURE WAS WRONG

News: The owner of one of the big truck being used for the hauling of gravel on the roads which are being improved in the Clarion territory was in town Friday and decided he would go ahead to Belmond, despite the heavy roads. "You'd better stick to town awhile," he was advised, "for the roads are soft and you'll do a lot of damage to them hauling that old bus over them now." "That may be so," the man said, "but I've got a right on the road and I'd like to see any one tell me where to head in." He started out. He managed to get to the corner at the St. John's Catholic school in Clarion and then the blamed truck began to slide. It wavered between the center of the road and the ditch, and finally rolled down the ditch, where it sank in about two feet of mud. He sent a frantic call for help to the garage, and another truck came out, but all the trucks and all the "king's horses and men" couldn't bring the truck out of its muddy berth. Saturday a big tractor was called into service and finally pulled the truck out. It cost the man about $15.00 to be so dead sure he was within his rights, which served him right!

STOLEN BUICK RECOVERED

Eagle: A Buick was stolen at Webster City Saturday evening and was found abandoned on South Lucas avenue sometime Saturday night. The car belonged to E. W. Brewer, a farmer living east of Webster City. The police at Webster City notified Marshall Reynolds to be on the watch for this car and about noon a telephone call was received by Mr. Reynolds telling him of a Buick which had been standing in the street all day. The car was driven to the Smith & Paine garage and later Mr. Brewer came up from Webster City and indentified the car as his own. He is positive the car had been driven about two hundred miles by the parties who took it, as the same evening he had noticed his spedometer and it registered nearly two hundred miles more on Sunday afternoon.

The car had not been locked and the key was still in the switch lock when taken in charge by the local authorities.

BELMOND HIGH WINS FIRST GAME.

The Belmond high school ball team defeated Corwith in a hard fought game on the latter's grounds.

Madsen working on the mound for the locals pitched a steady game, pulling out of several bad holes, allowing five hits and striking out 9 men. Nine hits were reaped from "Smiling Bob" Corwith's pitcher.

Our boys displayed smooth team work and plenty of fight thruout the game. The return game to be played here next Friday at 4:00 o'clock should prove an interesting battle. Come out and see a real ball game. One not played for money but for the sport, to determine the best team of all HOME PLAYERS. Back our team.

Date: Friday. Time: 4:00.

Legion Auxiliary Hold Fine Meeting Friday

Officers Elected And Plans Are Made For Membership Drive

NOW HAVE 23 MEMBERS

The members of the women's auxiliary to the local post of the American Legion met at the Legion club roms on Friday afternoon of last week and had a splendid meeting in which officers were elected and plans made for a membership drive in the coming months.

The officers chosen for the organization were as follows:

President: Mrs. Mae Wallace.
Vice Pres.: Mrs. C. M. Morse.
Secretary: Mrs. Claude Benson.
Treasurer: Mrs. Glen Klemme.

The auxiliary has at the present time some twenty odd members, there being eight who signified their intention to join at the meeting on last Friday. An organized campaign is to be put on for new members, and the auxiliary will doubtless soon be one of the most important parts of the Legion. Meetings are to be held once a month, it is understood, ton each third Tuesday of the month.

Mr. And Mrs. W. S. Prichard Celebrate Silver Anniversary.

Leader: September 17, 1896. Walter Pritchard led Miss Jennie Finch to the matrimonial alter. The ceremony took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. I. Rosecrans in Belmond, the latter being a sister of the bride. A little mathematical calculation will show you that this event transpired just 25 years ago. We met Walter early the morning of the 17th in the Ziesemer & Paulson Barber Shop and his order to "Bill" was for a wedding shave. The family was to respond to an invitation to come to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Earl Martin of Belmond and celebrate their silver wedding anniversary. This was Saturday and the real celebration did not take place until Sunday. At that time Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Finch and family of Corwith, Mr. and Mrs. W. I. Rosecrans, Chas Pritchard, and Mr. and Mrs. Arkwright of Buffalo Center became members of the party. Twenty-five years ago Walt was a gallant groom and justly proud was he as he led his beautiful, blushing bride to the altar. Time has been kind to them both. Their marital state has been but a continuation of the wedding day dream. Their home has been blessed with eight strong, healthy children; they have prospered well and as they celebrated their silver wedding they could look back upon happy days and realize that they had many things to be thankful for. Let us hope that no shadow crosses their path in the next quarter century and that they will be privileged to celebrate their golden wedding anniversary surrounded by their children, relatives and friends, with not a link in the chain missing. Their daughter Miss Katherine, surprised them by arriving from Chicago in time to participate in the celebration.

GUESTS AT THE SNYDERS' HOME

Mr. and Mrs. M. W. Snyder of Elkhart, Ind., Mr. and Mrs J. C. Snyder of Homer Mich. Mrs. C. F. Robertson of Lamar Mo., Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Snyder and Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Scott of Belmond, Ia., have returned to their respective homes by automobile after visiting for several days with their brother and his wife, Mr. O. E. Snyder and Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Smogard of this city. Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Snyder have also been visiting their son Clare Snyder and wife and Mrs. Bert Bergma. After attending the South Dakota state fair here, the visitors pronounced it to be the finest exposition of the kind that they had ever seen, having attended several state fairs in the east.—Huron, S. D., "Huronite."

PLEASANT TOWNSHIP SOCIAL ATTENDED BY 500 PEOPLE

Farmers of Pleasant township scored another hit last Thursday evening, September 22, when between 400 and 500 farmers met at the home of J. F. Henn for a most enjoyable social evening.

The program of the evening was planned and organized by the teachers of Pleasant township under the leadership of Miss Vida Jenison who presided at the evening program. The teachers should be congratulated for the splendid effort made in arranging such an interesting program and everyone in the community should appreciate the fact that a program of this kind requires a lot of preparation. This meeting was a sure sign that Pleasant township has a group of teachers who believe in doing things.

The feature of the program was a short address given by Rev. A. H. Waalkes the local minister in that community. Mr. Waalkes reminded his listeners of the need of a farmer's organization particularly during these troublesome times. He spoke quite at length along the line of community life reminding his audience of the value of social meetings and urged them to continue in their social development. He spoke of the social life of the community as being one of the most important phases of the Farm Bureau work.

The county agent was present and gave a short talk on the accomplishments of the Farm Bureau and urged upon his audience that this information be used in soliciting for memberships on the day of the state wide membership drive, which will be on October 12th.

Ice cream and cake were served after the evening program and we understand that the committee in charge of the eats underestimated the number of people who would attend and before they were thru serving found that about one hundred to one hundred and fifty had not been served.

Let us hope that the good work will go on and that the people of Pleasant township will continue to have their social mixes and in this way cooperate wyith one another to the best advantage.

ARE YOU SOMEBODY?

In your later home have you acquired prominence, or are you just on the road?

No matter—there is a place where you are far more than just a "nobody." It is in your own home town. To the folks at home you are some body. Do them the same honor and keep them cataloged in your mind.

Your home town paper makes this possible. It is a keen gatherer of news of vital importance in its field; it is as metropolitan in tone and make-up as is consistent with its special mission—the purveying of 100 per cent pure news about neighbor to neighbor; it is chock full of character—a perfect mirror of the life of its district—your "old stamping ground."

Friday last was not an unlucky day with Treasurer Allen for on that date he secured what is said to have been the best offer for road bonds made in Iowa this year. A total of $68,000 county road twenty year funding bonds bearing six per cent interest were offered for sale and were sold to Schanke & Co. of Mason City at a premium of $4,495.00. Nine companies had personal representatives at the court house when the sale began. Open bids were received and the sale conducted very much like a farmer's public sale, except that there was no free lunch at noon.

County Attorney Rogers received notice of the finding of an abandoned auto at Eagle Grove on Thursday night of last week. TOO MANY DEBTS

Times: We have read of many accounts of late where farmers "went broke" and were compelled to take bankruptcy but we little dreamed that one of our Klemme farmers had come so nearly the same financial point.

Frank Glanville, who has been on the Ax farm a mile north of this town became engulfed in debt with no possible releif in sight and he undoubtedly figured that the easiest way out of the diff culty would be to leave for parts unknown. This he did and with his family left in their car sometime last week, leaving the debts to look after themselves. He left crops stock, machinery and all.

Stock and machinery will perhaps settle some of the largest accounts as he had about a hundred head of cattle, some hogs and horses. We understand his debts amount to several thousand dollars, but the approximate amount we have not learned.

HOW ABOUT THAT SALE?

Some of you farmers have been considering having a sale this fall or winter, haven't you? You have been wondering whether the banks would handle the notes, what the stuff would be apt to bring, and the hundred other questions which the farmer has to figure now.

Just forget the buyers and the advert sing of your sale; let the Independent do that part of the work for you. That's our business, and we claim to be pretty fair at it, too.

And we want to show you why we can find the buyers, more buyers, and bring them to your sale at a lesser cost than you can do it yourself.

You have 500 bills printed; you post some of them, and mail some of them, and the rest you hand around. A few people will stop to read those you post up, but travel and the times are both too fast nowadays for the oldfashioned method of posting bills to bring the results that they used to. Those you mail do good work; they go d'rect to some of the people interested, that's a good way. Those you hand around may do good work to a certain extent, but some of them go to people who have already received a bill, and others to folks who are too busy just then to read it, and it is forgotten or thrown away.

You pay to get the bills printed; you have to pay postage on those you mail; and you spend many dollar's worth of time folding, stamping, and posting, handing around, and distrib-ut'ng the bills.

You reach 500 people.

The Independent puts your sale in the paper, where it is in plain sight, and mails the paper to eleven hundred people, farmers actively engaged in the business, retired farmers, who still maintain an interest in the farm and are maybe helping son get started. Instead of 500 people your sale reaches 1,100, and that is the difference in numbers.

You pay for printing the bills, for postage to mail them, throw in hours of your own time that you could use to better advantage, and it costs you more dollars in the end and you reach 500 people.

Your sale in the Independent costs you less money, reaches six hundred more people, saves your own time, and gets more results. One buyer from the six hundred more people reached will add enough to the sale price of one art'cle to pay for the advertising.

Which, friend farmer, strikes you as the better method?

AND THE FARMER GETS ——?

"Payment of $3,000,000 to the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad under Section 210 of the Transportation Act has been made by the Treasury. The payment was made on the order of the Inter-State Commerce Commission approving an advance of $8,000,000 to the railroad to meet necessary expenses. The remaining $5,000,000 will be paid by the Treasury to the carr'er within the next ten days."

The forgoing is taken from a financial weekly report, issued last week. It illustrates one great trouble with this country today: the fact that most any big concern can get money for "necessary expenses," except the farmer. You haven't seen any such reports of money being loaned to the agricultural interests of the country by the Treasury—or by anyone else. $3,000,000 s quite a nice little sum $8,000,000 is a st'll nicer one; they would do a great deal of good to the farmers of America right now. Then why not let the farmers have some?

Why is it that the railroads can get all the money they seem to need and the farmers cansot get any? Who is standing in the way? If the Inter-State Commerce Commission can approve giving the railroads eight million dollars, why cannot the farmer get a little of all this surplus coin? There is more money in the country today than ever before; the per capita is the largest in the history of the country. Something is exceedingly rotten in America.

GREAT STOCK SHOW TO BE HELD AT WATERLOO

Waterloo, Ia., Sept. 15.—An array of dairy cattle which will rank second to none in the h story of dairy shows, fine enough and big enough to make the fathers of the breed "sit up and take notice with a royal entainment program to match are but three of the many features to the twelfth annual Dairy Cattle Congress and International Belgian Horse Show to be held here the week of Sept. 26 to Oct.2.

Special emphasis has been placed on the amusement and entertainment this year, by E. S. Estel secretary and manager of Iowa's biggest exclus've livestock event. He has procured 15 big-time vaudeville acts, direct from the Hipprodome in New York and they will preform twice daily at the big Hipprodrome on the grounds. The greater Waterloo band complete, and two orchestras will furnish the music throut the expos'tion.

The light harness and high school riding horse show will be a revelation this year, Mr. Estle states. There will be evening horse shows and afternoon exhibitions thruout the week. The famous six-horse hitch belonging to M. H. Peters of Omaha, pronounced as the greatest six-horse draft team in the country, will be here for the occasion. In this outfit are Ivahoe and Blucher, winners of more prizes than other two draft horses known.

THIEVES AT WORK

Chronicle: One night last week some one without a heart broke into the cellar of the George Autry home and stole about fifty quart jars of freshly canned fruit, and also a sack of nuts which one of the Autry boys had gathered from the woods the day previous. No clue to the th'eves has been found, but there is a strong suspicion as to who the guilty parties are, and if they do not hurry and eat up that fruit they may be "discovered" with the evidence right in their possession.

Stole Battery From Ford Car.

V. J. Kratz also came in for a trimming from the night prowlers. He placed his Ford auto in his garage one night, and when he stopped the car for the night she was spinning like a clock. However, when Mr. Kartz urged Lizzie to turn over the next morning she refused to budge—no coaxing could get her to make a move, so after some investigation it was discovered that the battery had been stolen out of the car during the night. Kartz had to purchase a new battery to make the Ford go, and instead of raising the price of meat to make up for the lost battery the Kartz Market and Grocery announce a reduction in meat prices, as will be seen by their advertisement in this issue of the Chronicle.

IOWA FARM CREDIT CORPORATION.

The Iowa Farm Credit corporation was organized, is operating and will always labor for the benifit of the farmer of Iowa alone.

Its officers and directors chosen from each district and representing equally the farmer and banker interests of those districts makes certain the continued policy of service for every part of Iowa.

While the Iowa Farm Credit Corporation is in distinct and separate organization from either the State Bankers Association or the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation, nevertheless it is the materialization of the series of meetings which were held last fall at Waterloo, Ft. Dodge, Red Oak and Ottumwa by two combined representatives of both the organizations. Proper legislation and the formulation of the company itself was a direct result of the ativities of the committees appointed by these two organizations to study and present a workable plan suitable to the needs of the agricultural industry of Iowa to meet the requirements of the farmer and be built upon a sound financial foundation.

Consultation was had with, and all possible data secured from, banking and rediscounting authorities in Chicago and New York besides a series of conferences held within the state of Iowa. Athorities on agriculture at Ames, the department at Washington, and the foremost bankers of the whole country were called upon to offer suggestions to meet the peculair requirements of the farmer in their financial relation. Plans of other industries were studied and as a result of the imformation gathered, the corporation was organized with the feeling that every pratical angle was thoroughly covered as was humanly possible. The bill were prepared by the attorney for the Iowa Farm Bureau, and with their legislative committee submitted to various committees and sub-committees of the Thirty-Ninth General Assembly and were passed by the General Assembly without a dissenting vote. A special committee representing the Iowa Bankers Association and the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation then worked for six weeks formulating the Articles of Incorporation to meet the requirements of the farmers of Iowa.

The corporation is limited to meet the needs of the agricultural interests of the state of Iowa. Three-fourths of the money on deposit in our banks is farm money. The Iowa Farm Credit Corporation is wholly devoted to the farmers' affairs and can loan only on four kinds of paper:

1. Notes secured by Warehouse receipt of grain stored in bonded elevators or warehouses. This provision is to prepare for the future controlled marketing plans of the farm organizations.

2. Notes secured by Chattel Mortgage on his livestock, making possible additional collateral for farm credit.

3. Notes secured by bank endorsement, giving a field for responsible personal obligations.

4. Notes secured by collateral approved by Iowa State Bank laws.

Heretofore there has not been a distinction between investment capital and working capital in agricultural finance. This distinction can now be made and paper belonging to investment banking can be taken out of the field of commercial banking to the greater benefit of both bankers and farmers.

The presentation of a sound financial scheme for agricultural is the surest method of making certain a profitable marketing plan and the only method of withstanding the spreading of radical and unsound measures. To take advantage of these opportunities meams a return to normal conditions and a safeguard against the return of the experiences of the fast year. To further encourage such a plan the legislature made possible for State banks to purchase stock in such a corporation up to 10 per cent of its capital and surplus.

The operation of the Iowa Credit Corporation will not disturb the financial conditions in any county but will give immediate benefit wherever it begins to operate.

The financial question is the biggest question of Iowa today and it is certain that we must work out our own salvation. That the Iowa idea is safe, sound and practical is attested to by the fact that other states are already formulating plans patterned after Iowa laws, and from Washington recently a member of Congress advocated a plan for farm finance similar to the Iowa idea.

Let Iowa farmers and bankers make Iowa money work for the prosperity of Iowa.

LIGHTNING BURNS BARN.

Chronicle: During the electrical storm last Friday night the barn on the S. A. McDowell farm southeast of Chapin was struck by lightning and the barn was burned to the ground.

C. A. Law, son-in-law of Mr. McDowell, who has been running the farm for the past several years, lost two calves, some hay and harness. His loss amounts to $430 and was covered by insurance. Mr. Law was fortunate in that he had turned his horses into the pasture for the night, as the fire was well under way before it was discovered and it would have been to late to save the animals.

The value of the barn was about $1,000 and it was covered by $600 insurance. The buildings surrounding the barn were saved only thru the hard work of the neighbors who gathered to assist Mr. Law.

Considerable hail also fell in the vicinity of Chapin during the storm, but no particular damage was done. Lightning killed stock at various points around the country, probably a dozen cases being reported. Few farmers lost more than one head.

WHO OWNS THE AIR?

Lieut. James Williams, an aviator must defend himself in court at Davenport because he violated a city ordinance that makes it an offence to fly within 2,000 feet of the ground. All of which suggests that the next general assembly will be forced to pass measures regulating flying machines.

A suit is pending in Lee county brot by a farmer because the team his wife was driving to Fort Madison ran away, frightened from the noise made by an airoplane flying very low. The woman was severly injured and heavy damages are asked. The airoplane has also projected the issue as to who owns the air. A land owner lays claim to everything that is beneath him. The question is whether or not he owns the sky above him.

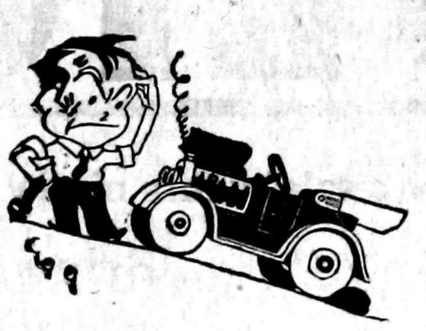
Sure enough, the old bus went back on me



IT WAS a whale.
OF A hill, and the old bus.
GROANED AND shuddered.
AND FINALLY stalled.
AND YOU could fry eggs.
ON THE radiator.
WELL, WHAT I know.
ABOUT BUZZ wagons.
COULD BE written big.
ON A postage stamp.
BUT I fiddled around.
AND TORE my new shirt.
AND GOT all smeared up.
THE ENGINE would start.
BUT LIZZIE wouldn't.
NOT ON that hill.
SO I quit and lit up.
ONE OF my cigarettes.
AND THOUGHT it over.
THEN I had a hunch.
PUSHED HER around.
PULLED A thing-a-ma-jig.
AND THE blame boat.
BACKED UP the hill.
WITHOUT EVEN hesitating.
SO I learned a trick.
WHICH EVERY driver.

FATTY ARBUCKLE IS DONE.

Whether the courts find Fatty Arbuckle guilty of the brutal crime of which he is charged, Fatty Arbuckle's days as a screen favorite are past. He is done. So far as the screen is concerned, he has committed suicide. By his own standards of behavior he has cut himself off from the sucess that has attended his actitives in the cinema.

In the past few months, the film producers have been carring on a war against proposed censorship of the screen. They have declared most emphatically that they themselves were developing higher standards, and that the cencorship by national state and municipal authorities was absurd and un-American. In their propaganda they have declared themselves as aiming at meeting the call of public welfare for better films. And while the film folks are cencoring their own films, might it not be well for them to cencor their stars? Cencorship of stars, in truth, is far more important than cencorship of films.

What a blow to youthful ideals has been dealt through the actions of some of the men and women who have endeared themselves to thousands of people!

Rottenness in personal life seems to carry its punishment inevitably, and film stars are not immune to punishment here on earth, however, severe the punishment hereafter may be. Even film stars are no exceptions to the general rule. Once a public finds out the truth of a star's immorality, that star wanes. Often the light is completely obliterated.

Who has seen pictures featuring F. X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, since the disclosures in connection with their lives?

Who can ever again see Mary Pickford or Douglas Fairbanks without mentally recounting the destruction of families ties and ideals that lie back of their marriage?

The courts may not find Fatty Arbuckle guilty of the charge of murer. He may never suffer the death penalty and he may never see the inside of penitentiary, but his manner of living has been exposed. The real Fatty Arbuckle is thrown on the screen.

The withdrawal from the screen of pictures in which he appears be speaks his death knell. Whatever the courts may do, the theater managers, keen discerners of public sentiment, have passed judgment on him. As a film star, Fatty Arbuckle is done.—Hampton Chronicle.

Your chance of attaining old age is a good one if overwork is the hazard.

Livestock Shipping Association Short Course For Managers And Officers.

Co-operative livestock marketing by farm organizations is a vital question in Iowa. Over 700 shipping points are being served today by such associations. The marketing of the 1921 hog crop will soon commence, with many difficulties, and problems that every manager will have to meet.

Co-operative livestock marketing has been in effect since 1904 when an association was started at Postville in Allamakee county. The growth was slow until 1917 as only 57 associations had been organized and were active in 1916. The next few years up to and including 1920 marked the climax in the formation of associations. During the year of 1920 alone, over 300 organizations were formed which brought the total number of active associations to 647 which are serving in various ways over 700 points.

The short and rapid reriod of organization growth has been followed with many problems. In many cases they have been of minor nature and in other instances the trouble have been of such form as to be a matter of life and death with the associations. none of the ills, however, are too big to be solved. It is only a case of adjusting the management and membership to the new order of advanced organization which will require some little time.

The Farm Bureau has recieved many requests for information on livestock shipping association problems. It is cooperating with the Extension service in holding short courses which will aid managers and officers in improving the efficiency of the local associations. The State Federation of Cooperative Livestock Shippers in cooperation with the State Farm Bureau Federation is taking care of the larger problems.

It remains for Wright county to take care of the local problems of its association. This is a real opportunity. Members and offiicers of associations should authorize their managers to register by Oct. 7th. for the course at Fort Dodge on Oct. 20th and 21st, or the course at Mason City on Oct. 25th, and 26th. The Farm Bureau office has registeraton blanks and complete information.

A Billion For Farm Credit

The War Finance Corporation is rapidly perfecting its machinery for making available to agriculture the $1,000,000,000 in credit recently authorized by Congress. Eugene Meyer, Jr., managing director of the War Finance Corporation, is now on a tour of the western agricultural country to survey its credit needs. His schedule is: Los Angeles, Sept. 19; Salt Lake City Sept. 22nd; Denver, Sept 22; Hutchinson, Kan., Sept. 24; Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 24; Omaha, Sept. 26; Des Moines, Sept. 26; and Chicago, Sept. 28th. The American Farm Bureau Federation has asked Mr. Meyer for a conference when he arrives in Chicago. If the request is granted, it is planned to invite representives of the various state Farm Bureau Federations to attend.

The general plan contemplates agricultural loan agencies in the principal cities of the country. The agricultural loan agencies will receive applications for loans from banks, trusts companies, and cooperative organizations. Specials application forms for these loans will be made available for any farmer or farmer's organizations, bank or trust company. They may be obtained from the agricultural loan agency, a Federal Reserve Bank or the War Finance Corporation in Washington. When approved by the loan agency, the application will be submitted to the War Finance Corporation. If approved, the money will be made at once available to the borrower.

The War Finance Corporation is completing its list of committees, which will advise in regard to loans requested by any bank, banker trust company, or cooperative organization It is understood that these committees will be comprised of five representives of bankers and business men. It has been sugested by the American Farm Bureau Federation that farmers also be included on the committees. Farmers are not always borrowers, and they know the needs of agriculture better than any other class. The membership of the committees and their location, together with specfic instructions for applications for obtaining the loans will be made public by the War Finance Corporation within the next few days. Three members of each committee will be selected from the city or town in which the headquarters of the loan agency will be located. The application form are being prepared in the government printing office and will be placed in the hands of the committees. While the committees have not yet been announced it is understood that the chairman and headquarters named to date are as follows:

Evans Wooler Indianapolis, Ind.
Jas. B. Brown, Louisville Ky
F. W. Thomas, Omaha, Nebr.
R. E. MacGregor, Minneapolis.
Albert A. Reed, Denver, Colo.
R. L. Rutter, Spokane, Wash.
T. A. Marlow, Helena, Mont.
Edward Cookingham, Portland.
Geo. R. Abbot, Cheyenne, Wyo.
Chas. Claiborne, New Orleans, La.
Oscar Nenton, Jackson, Miss.
R. B. Snowden, Memphis, Tenn.
J. R. Young, Raleigh, N. C
Marion Sansom, Fort Worth, Tex.
Richard E. Cunningham, Richmond,
J. Pope Matthews, Columbia, S. C.

The American Farm Bureau Federation has been most active in its support of this measure. The general plan was originated in the Federation office last January. Farm Bureau officials have been in constant consultation in working out the details of the measure. The American Farm Bureau Federation is now insisting that the credit be made available for the individual farmer or co-operative organization in the simplest and most direct way possible. Full announcement of procedure will be made upon completion of the plans, which should be within a comparatively short time.

BIG SOCIAL AT ROWAN

One of the largest community gatherings ever held in Rowan was staged at the Rowan consolidated school Friday evening, Sept. 23, when about 500 people of the vicinity of Rowan representing the teachers, parents, the school pupils and members of Iowa township farm bureau, met for an evening of recitations, dialogues, several musical numbers and a number of splendid addresses.

The superintendent of the consolidated school and his corps of teachers should be congratulated upon their ability to get all people of the community to co-operate with one another in holding such a community program. The school program as arranged by the teachers was the life of the evening's entertainment and due credit should be given the superintendent and his co-workers in the efforts put forth to make this program possible.

Several interesting addresses were given during the course of the evening's entertainment. Rev. Nye gave an address on community life and spoke especially of the co-operation between the teachers and parents. Mr. J. E. Miller, president of the school board, gave a most interesting talk on the school work and urged a closer co-operation between parents and the teachers Rev. Tomkinson came in for his share of the program and gave a very nice talk on community life and explained the advantage of our organized community life.

A short talk was given by the county agent followed by the address by A. J. Shinn who talked for about an hour on farm bureau activities of our state and nation. Mr. Shinn touched upon points which are of vital interest to every farmer at the present time.

The people of Rowan and the surrounding community are to be congratulated upon the splendid spirit of co-operation as exhibited at their social last Friday night and it is hoped that this spirit of helpfulness to one another will continue in the community and that these social gatherings will be continued at Rowan.

Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

"I'm a-goin' to tell ye o' this danger," she said, "and trust to you a-bein' man enough to do what I axed ye to. Black Adam Ball, he's got a new-fashioned rifle and smokeless ca'tridges and steel bullets; and in a few minutes he'll be hid in a clum o' sassafras back thar in yore meadow, whar he means to set and pick off you Morelands one by one—and you and Bill Dale fust, 'count o' the beatin's you two put on him! But pap had nothin' to do with it, and rickollect that! Now I've saved all o' yore lives, 'cause ye couldn't ha' heerd the sound o' his rifle in all o' this noise; and ye couldn't ha' seed the smoke o' his gun, 'cause it don't make no smoke. Hold up the white flag, John Moreland—hurry!"

"Hold Up the White Flag, John Moreland—Hurry!"

Babe thoughtlessly arose to her feet, and one side of her brown head appeared before the sights of her father's rifle—her father fired quickly, too quickly for a perfect aim—the bullet burned its way across her temple and through her hair, and she crumpled at Bill Dale's knees, totally unconscious. Dale gave a hoarse cry and gathered her limp figure into his arms. John Moreland waved aloft the white handkerchief and bellowed to his kinsmen to stop firing. Then silence came.

"Come over here, Ben Littleford!" shouted John Moreland. "Ye've shot yore own gyrul!"

And to his brother Abner, whose right forearm was wrapped in a blood-stained blue bandana:

"Black Adam is hid som'eres in this meadow; go and ketch him, and don't take no chanst with him. Shoot him like a dawg ef he tries to trick ye!"

A dozen men ran to look for the would-be sniper. The Littlefords, still armed, came dashing across the river. Ben Littleford threw down his rifle and knelt beside his daughter; he wrung his big hands and cursed the day that had seen him born.

Dale held her close. His face was as white as hers, and his eyes were flaming.

"Why don't you shoot all your womenfolk?" he said to the Littleford chief, and every word cut like a knife. "It's by far the simplest way; it's merciful, y'know. See, she isn't breaking her heart over your murderous fighting now. No, keep your hands away—you're not fit to touch her!"

They brought water and wet the young woman's face, and bathed the red streak across her temples. They did all they knew how to do to bring her back to consciousness, but, except for her beating pulse and her breathing, she remained as one dead. Hours passed, leaden hours, and her condition was unchanged.

Dale beckoned to John Moreland, who had just returned from having seen Adam Ball caught, disarmed, and imprisoned in an old tobacco barn. Moreland hastened to Dale, the new master.

"When does the next south-bound train pass the Halfway switch?" Dale wanted to know.

Moreland looked toward the sun.

"We could make it, all right, but it's a fast train, and it don't never stop at the switch."

"Then we'll hold it up," declared the new master in a voice of iron. "This is a case for a surgeon. Get a blanket and two poles and make a litter."

John Moreland hastened away obediently. Dale turned to Ben Littleford, who sat in a motionless heap beside the still figure of his daughter.

"It was only a few hours ago," he said accusingly, "that this poor girl told me she'd be glad to give her life to stop your fighting, and now, perhaps, she's done it! You're a brute, Littleford. I like to fight, myself, but not when it costs women anything."

The conscience-stricken hillman gave no sign that he had heard. There was silence save for the low murmur of the river and the tragic song of a bird somewhere in the branches of the big white sycamore.

CHAPTER VI.

Back Home.

Every mother's son of the feudists was numbered in the party that filed across David Moreland's mountain to intercept the next south-bound train. The old enmity was for the time being forgotten. Members of one clan rubbed elbows with members of the other clan, and thought nothing of it. John Moreland himself carried one end of the crude litter that held the limp form of Babe Littleford; Bill Dale carried the other end.

Close behind the litter walked Babe's father, seeming old and broken with remorse for the thing he had done. The grief of Ben Littleford was touching now, and Dale was a little sorry that he had spoken so bitterly to him.

They reached the Halfway switch ten minutes before the arrival of the fast mail. A short passenger train was on the long siding, waiting for the south bound to pass. Dale gave his end of the litter to Caleb Moreland, and strode up to the locomotive. The engineer sat quietly smoking in his cab.

Dale wanted the fast mail stopped, and gave his reasons.

The engineer smoked and considered. It was against rules. Dale swore at rules. The engineer said he would see the conductor. He did, and the conductor stepped to the ground and began to consider.

"Better put her on my train," he said finally, "and take her to Barton's station. There's a good doctor at Barton's—"

"But this is a case for a surgeon!" impatiently interrupted Bill Dale.

They disagreed. The old trainman was a close friend of the doctor at Barton's station. What was the difference between a doctor and a surgeon, anyway?

Dale became angry.

"You'll stop the fast mail for us," he snapped, "or we'll take your d—d red flag and hold her up long enough to put the girl aboard, and you've got only half a second to decide which!"

The conductor was obdurate. The mountain men were too hot-headed to bear with him longer. The positions of a dozen rifles underwent a sudden change. The conductor immediately went pale and mentioned the law—but he agreed to stop the southbound.

As he ordered his flagman up the tracks, the sound of the fast train's whistle came to their ears.

The flier came to a screeching halt with sparks streaming from its wheels. Bill Dale and John Moreland passed the litter and its burden into the baggage car and followed it hastily, and Ben Littleford climbed in after them. John Moreland leaned out of the doorway and ordered his son Luke to pass him his rifle, and Luke obeyed promptly.

There was a shriek from the whistle, and the brakes were released; the train began to gather momentum. A baggageman approached John Moreland and asked why the rifle. Moreland half closed one keen grey eye and patted the walnut stock of his repeater.

"Oh, I jest brought it along to see at everybody has a straight deal," he drawled—"go on about yore business, mister."

The baggageman went about his business.

The conductor of the fast train was very unlike the conductor of the northbound. When he had learned something of the circumstances, he insinuated that Dale had done exactly the right thing. He would see whether there was a doctor aboard.

Within five more minutes he returned in company with an elderly man wearing a pointed beard and nose glasses.

"Doctor McKenzie," he said politely; "Mr. ——"

"Dale."

The two nodded, and the physician knelt beside the litter, which had been placed with its ends on boxes to allow the center to swing free. He made as thorough an examination as was possible under the conditions, then arose and stood looking down upon the young woman with something like admiration in his sober, professional eyes.

"Perfect physique," he said as though to himself. . . . "She will have to undergo an operation," he told Dale. "The bone there is broken in slightly, making a compression; she will doubtless be unconscious until the pressure is relieved. But she has fine chances for a quick and entire recovery, with a good surgeon on the job, so there's not much ground for worry."

"Perfect Physique," He Said, as Though to Himself.

Dale was glad. They were all glad. Ben Littleford laughed nervously in his sudden joy. He went down to his knees beside his daughter, took up one of her limp hands and stroked it in a way that was pitiful.

When he arose he spoke cordially to Moreland. But Moreland didn't reply. He still looked upon his old enemy with contempt.

Doctor McKenzie was leaving the train at the next town of importance, and he would wire Doctor Braemer to meet them with an ambulance, if Dale wished.

"If you please," said Dale.

They reached the city shortly before midnight, and were promptly met by the surgeon. Braemer took charge of the patient, put her into his ambulance and hurried her to his private hospital. Bill Dale and the two clan chiefs followed in an automobile. The hillmen had never before seen an automobile; but they asked no questions about it, and the only word of comment was this, from John Moreland:

"I don't like the smell."

Everything had been made ready for the operation, and Babe received surgical aid without delay.

The two mountaineers and Dale waited in another room. Dale had induced John Moreland to unload his rifle, both chamber and magazine. Babe's father paced the floor anxiously now and then. Moreland sat like a stone, with his empty rifle between his knees, and watched his old enemy queerly.

It seemed a long time before Braemer came to them and told them smilingly that it was all over and that the girl was then coming from under the effects of the ether. She would be all right soon, he was reasonably certain. No, they'd better not see her just then. But perhaps they could see her at some time during the afternoon of the following day.

Dale escorted his two companions to a modest hotel and then put them in a room that had but one bed; by thus throwing them together in a strange land, he hoped to do something toward making them friends. Then Dale went to another room, undressed and went to bed.

It may be noted, parenthetically as it were, that John Moreland and Ben Littleford quickly reached a wordless agreement not to sleep together—they divided the pillows and linens evenly, tore the odd coverlet exactly in half, and slept on the floor.

When Dale went down to the lobby the following morning an alert-eyed young fellow sprang from a chair and hastened up to him.

"By George, Bobby!" Dale exclaimed, as they began to shake hands. "How did you know I was here, anyway? Your boasted nose for news, eh?"

"Guilty," smiled McLaurin. "I got word last night that a mountain girl had been brought to Braemer's, accidentally shot, and I smelled a feud; so I hurried over to get the story. You had just left, and Braemer's didn't know much about it. It was too soon after the operation, they said, for her to see me; then one of the nurses whispered to me that you had brought her, and said that I would find you here. So here I am, Bill, and I want the story. I'll phone it in, and then I'll give you some news."

"The story mustn't be published, Bobby," Dale replied. "For one reason, there is a feud; and if the law knew, it might take a hand—you see, I think there is a better way to take care of that feud. And I am of the opinion that the girl wouldn't like the publicity. Suppose you forget all about it, Bobby."

If McLaurin was disappointed, he kept it well to himself.

"They said she was handsome, a sort of primitive Venus," he winked. "Is there a romance connected, Bill?"

"Not yet," smiled Dale.

"But soon?"

"Who can tell?" Dale shrugged a little. "Tell me the news."

"All right." McLaurin drew his friend toward a pair of empty chairs. "I married Patricia Clavering the day before yesterday. We—"

"Bully! Go on."

"We were married in an automobile, with her father and 'poor dear Harry' chasing us like wildfire in another car. Yesterday we went to housekeeping in a cute little suburban bungalow, furniture on the installment plan. Her people won't even look at us, Bill! But do we care? Bill Dale, I ask you, old dear, do I seem to be worrying? Honest, I'm so happy I'm afraid something is going to happen to me. I'm to have a lift in salary soon, and we won't be long in paying for the furniture; and when that's done, we'll buy the bungalow.

"And I'm informing you now, old savage," he continued, "that you're having dinner with us this evening. You'll find it pleasant. We do as we please, you see. If you like, you may stir your coffee with your finger, eat with your knife, reach clean across the table, and pick your teeth with your fork. You can eat with your hat on, and you may have your dessert first. You can have an extra chair for your feet, and you can go to sleep at the table. Don't fail us. Pat wants to thank you for 'casting her aside' at the altar."

Dale laughed boyishly. McLaurin went on:

"There's more news. Your father has been trying hard to find you. He sent a man to Atlanta to look for you. He told me he'd give me a house and lot if I'd find you—and if there was a little more of the highway robber in me, I'd call his hand!"

"And mother—have you seen her?" Dale muttered.

"I've seen her twice since the near-wedding."

"Did she have anything to say about me? Tell me the whole truth, Bobby. I can take it, old man. I'm big enough."

McLaurin frowned. "Since you've asked me, Bill, your mother—I overheard her telling your father that she would never forgive you for the 'utterly shameless, disgraceful scene' you made in church."

"I see," said Dale. He brightened and went on, "As soon as I can get my two friends down to the dining room, Bobby, you're going with me to father. We're going to claim that house and lot for you."

"For Patricia's sake, I've a thundering big notion to take you up," laughed McLaurin. "Your dad would never miss it."

"That's it—take me up for Pat's sake," said Dale, rising. "You'd be foolish if you didn't. You should be willing to do anything, almost, for Pat. She's a jewel, Bobby."

Half an hour later they caught a passing car that soon carried them to a palace of granite and stone and cream-colored brick—the home of the old coal king, John K. Dale.

At the wide front gateway young Dale drew back.

"Bring father out here," he said in a low voice. "From what you told me, I guess mother wouldn't want me to come in. But you can find out about that—"

He hoped his mother would want to see him. While she had never seemed to care for him as other mothers cared for their boys; while she hadn't been quite so dear to him as she might have been—

"And if she wents to see me, Bobby, let me know."

McLaurin smiled a somewhat worried smile, and went up to the front door. A moment later he was shown in. Yet another moment, and John K. Dale, his florid face beaming with gladness, hastened out to the gateway. Young Dale was instantly touched by his father's new attitude toward him; then he remembered the long night of David Moreland's people, and he stiffened a little and drew back a pace.

"You've come home to stay, haven't you, Carlyle?" said the older man, and his voice was filled with pleading. "What you did is all right; we'll never mention it again. You'll stay, won't you, Carlyle, my boy?"

"No," answered the son, a trifle coldly in spite of himself. "I've spent all the idle, useless years I'll ever spend. I'm getting ready to develop the coal in David Moreland's mountain."

"David—Moreland's—mountain!"

The retired coal magnate breathed the three words in a husky tone. He put forth a hand and rested it against one of the huge stone gateposts, as though to steady himself, and some of the color went from his face.

"You say David Moreland's mountain, Carlyle?" jerkily.

"Yes."

"And you—you learned about David Moreland?"

"Yes." Bill Dale folded his arms and stood there looking at his father with eyes that accused.

"You know who killed him?" old Dale muttered.

"I do, and it was a shame—a black shame."

"Yes, it was a shame. Nobody knows that half so well as I know it," said John K. Dale. His mouth quivered. He looked downward, looked up again. "Son, you can never say or think worse things about me than I have said and thought about myself—because of that."

Dale the younger glanced toward the house. Robert McLaurin was coming slowly down the veranda steps. Mrs. Dale was nowhere in sight. She didn't want to see her son; she didn't even want him in the house. Bill Dale read it all in his friend's downcast countenance, and it was somehow a great disappointment.

"You'll need money if you're going to develop that coal property," Dale the elder was saying. "You haven't any money, and those mountain folk haven't any. I'll give you all that's needed. I'll send you mining machinery, and expert mining men; I'll—"

"You Know Who Killed Him?" Old Dale Muttered.

"You needn't," broke in the embittered Bill Dale. "I can get the necessary funds without difficulty. I'll pay the debt myself. You've had a great many years in which to try to make amends, and you haven't done anything. You might have helped the Morelands without their even knowing that it was you—especially as they seem to have known you by another name—and that's the only way you could have helped them. Here you have one reason why I cannot accept assistance from you; don't you see, father? The Morelands wouldn't have it, and I couldn't lie to them."

He motioned to McLaurin, who had halted on the lower veranda step in order that he might not overhear, and turned and walked away. McLaurin followed, and soon overtook him.

Bill Dale stopped suddenly and faced back to his father.

"Remember that Bobby gets his house and lot!"

"Yes," replied John K. Dale, "Bobby gets his house and lot."

He went sadly toward the mansion that seemed to him now a good deal like a tomb. Young Dale touched his friend on the arm.

"Tell me, what did mother say? I know it's going to hurt, but—tell it."

"She was sitting beside an open window in the 'library,'" said McLaurin. "I told her that you were at the gate, and asked if she would like to see you. At first I was afraid she hadn't heard me. Then she opened a book that she was reading, found her place and marked it with a finger, and looked at me.

"'Who did you say was at the gate, Mr. McLaurin?' she asked.

"'Your son Carlyle,' I answered.

"'Mr. McLaurin,' she said to me coldly, 'I want you never to forget this: To me there is no such person on earth as Carlyle Dale.'"

They went downtown in silence.

CHAPTER VII.

Lonesome.

When John Moreland and Ben Littleford had finished their breakfast there in the dining room of the Blaisdell, they drank the water from their fingerbowls, threatened with sudden death the waiter who snickered, and found the way to the lobby.

To Littleford the minutes dragged soddenly. Finally he told Moreland, in a sentence filled with double negatives, that he could bear the suspense no longer, and proposed that they set out at once for Doctor Braemer's hospital. The hotel manager overheard some of the one-sided conversation: he 'phoned the surgeon and learned that the young woman was resting easily, which information he passed on to the mountain men.

Ben Littleford was quiet for five minutes, more or less. Then he again proposed to John Moreland that they go to the hospital to see Babe. Moreland refused flatly, and accompanied his refusal with an unmistakable look of contempt.

"You're as restless as a dawg in a flea town," he told his old enemy, and with that he walked away.

A few minutes later Ben Littleford stole out unnoticed by his neighbor from the Big Pine, and went at a brisk gait up the street. Moreland found it out shortly afterward; he followed the Littleford chief hotfoot, and overtook him. Trust your hill dweller to note landmarks when he goes into the town territory — Littleford was headed straight for the hospital.

They walked for two blocks in silence. Moreland had assumed the attitude of one who has had the guardianship of an irresponsible person thrust upon him. But soon he softened somewhat.

"I shore cain't onderstand, Ben," he drawled, "how Bill Dale ever could bear it to live here."

"I wonder," Littleford said absent-mindedly, as though he had not heard, "whar Bill Dale is at? It's mighty durned lonesome without him, ain't it? That was good ham we had for breakfus', John."

"It wasn't ham. It was beef."

"It was ham."

"It was beef."

"It was ha—"

"Don't ye reckon," flared John Moreland, "that I know a dang cow's meat when I see it? It was beef!"

They had halted in the middle of a stream of pedestrians. A policeman crowded his way to them.

"Move on!" he growled.

* * * * * * *

Bill Dale was at that moment entering the lobby of the Blaisdell with Robert McLaurin at his side. Dale had just told McLaurin that he meant to go to Cincinnati to borrow money from his wealthy friend Harris. Then McLaurin told Dale something that saved him the journey to Cincinnati.

"You haven't heard about Harris, Bill? I'm sorry, because he would have accommodated you. He went broke a few days ago in the cotton smash. He was here yesterday, and left last night for Cincy."

Dale did not try to conceal his surprise and disappointment. Harris, for all his youth, had been a business marvel.

"I'll have to try somebody here, I guess. But I won't take it from father—mother wouldn't permit it, anyway, if she knew—and there are several other reasons. Queer how a fellow's mother would turn him down like this! Usually, y'know, it's a fellow's mother that sticks by him the longest. . . .

"I wonder where I could find old Newton Wheatley, of the Luther-Wheatley Iron company? I know him, all right. He always liked me, Bobby."

"You'll find him at home," McLaurin answered. "He's out of business, and here all the time now. He might take a shot at coal. Why not 'phone him from here?"

"I'll do that," Dale decided. "Look up my two friends for me, Bobby, will you?"

He was soon speaking to Newton Wheatley. He was brief in stating his wishes. To the question as to why he did not go to his father for funds—well, he had his reasons, and it was rather a private matter. Wheatley, of course, remembered the near-wedding.

The old iron man was silent for what seemed to Dale a very long time. Then his voice came over the wire with an almost ominous calm:

"Who besides you has seen this vein, Carlyle? Anybody that knows coal?"

"Yes, my father," Dale answered quickly. "He went over it years ago. Ask him about the coal in David Moreland's mountain. 'Phone him, and then 'phone me. I'm waiting at the Blaisdell."

Wheatley agreed a little reluctantly.

Dale waited patiently for fifteen minutes. Then the clerk called him to the 'phone. He took up the receiver with boyish eagerness.

Wheatley began cordially: "Your father tells me it is a good proposition, Carlyle, so I'll let you have all the money you'll need. And if you want a good mining man, I know where you can lay your hands on one; also I can furnish you, at half the original cost, all the necessary machinery and accessories. You didn't know the old Luther-Wheatley company dickered in coal as well as iron; eh? Well, it did. Let me see you at three o'clock this afternoon—"

Dale was jubilant. Here was a rare stroke of good fortune. He went to McLaurin—who had not yet found John Moreland and Ben Littleford—and told him about it. McLaurin was almost as happy as Dale over it. A bellboy appeared like a jack-in-the-box in the center of the floor. "Mistoh Cahlyle Dale! Mistoh Cahlyle Dale!"

Dale wheeled. "Well?"

"Wanted immejitly at Doctoh Braemeh's hospittle, suh!"

Dale shook hands with McLaurin and hurried toward the street.

A few minutes later Doctor Braemer met him in the reception room.

"What's wrong, doctor?"

The surgeon beckoned. "Come with me."

He turned and led the way through a long corridor and to a sunny white room where Babe Littleford lay with a bandage about her temples. Ben Littleford was on his knees at his daughter's bedside; he was slowly wringing his big, rough hands and begging piteously to be forgiven.

Babe stared at him a trifle coldly. She had not yet seen the two men who stood in the doorway. Then she interrupted her father:

"You hush, pap, and go away. I'd told ye a hunderd times about fightin' a-bein' murder, and 'specially to us wimmenfolks, and you never would pay any 'tention to me. You hush, pap, and go away. Ef I die, I'll jest haf to die. And ef I die, I shore do want to die in peace. Go way, pap."

"But ye must live, Babe, honey!" Ben Littleford moaned. "Ef you was to die, what'd I do?"

They left the car on the street and for some reason the neighbors became suspicious and phoned Marshal Reynolds who set a watch over the car. The quartette observed they were being watched hence made no attempt to claim the auto. And it turned out they had a very good reason, for in the car were two jugs full of wine, a third one half full and other evidence of an incriminating nature. The parties disappeared and now comes the owner of the automobile wanting possession of the machine. Inasmuch as it was used for the unlawful transportation of liquor it is a question open for discussion as to its being held for the amount of the fine due

LAYING TILE BY GUESS MEANS LOSS TO FARMER

That the actual engineering work done in South Dakota drainage projects in the past three years alone would more than cover the cost of maintaining the whole agricultural engineering project of the State college extension service is shown by figures given in the annual report of R. L. Patty, the extension engineer.

"This, however, is but a small part of the benefit that will come from these farm tile demonstration projects," says Mr. Patty. "In the older states millions of dollars have been wasted in laying tile by guess, in using too small a tile, and in opening the tile at the surface of the ground on a wide plat, expecting one string of tile to make farm of it. This kind of work has all had to be done over a cost, usually greater than the original, as the tile saved 'n taking them up would often not pay for the expense.

"Neighbors living in the vicinity of these demonstration projects in South Dakota are watching them and will not fail to realize that tiling laid on a good grade and checked up after be'ng laid so as to be sure it is on grade, is well worth the extra fee of a reliable engineer. The tiling on these projects is not larger than necessary. It is figured very closely and in some classes was too small for last year, in most cases it is not pratical to put in a main large enough to take care of floods such as those of last year. Very little money will be wasted by land owners in counties having county agents and in which the drainage demonstration is being carried on."

KEEP IN TOUCH WITH HOME TOWN

If everyone born and reared in this town had remained here to make his permanant home, we should be a town of many hundreds, more population than we now number.

On the other hand, cities and towns elsewhere that have attracted our youth would never have been founded, perhaps, and America would remain as it was in pioneer days—a great continent with few scattered cities—all too large, all over-congested.

But the opportunity that calls men away from their native home keeps the great movement alive, with the result that prat cally every corner of America has in it a representative of Belmond.

However the home town always has its interests for the people who needed the call to go elsewhere, and news of its progress and the doings of its people is welcome news to the natives and former resident, wherever he may now be located.

Correspondence, however faithful, cannot cover all the news and gossip, and seldom deals with more than family affairs. The perfect medium, of course, is the home town newspaper, which prints all the news of all the people. Some of these items, while of limited interest to you, might be of great interest to one away from home.

There is now a nation-wide movement on foot, sponsored by the National Editorial Association and other agencies, in which this paper is taking part, looking to a stimulation of interest 'n the Home Town Paper.

To do our part, we are this week offering an extra copy of The Independent to every subscriber with the request that he send it to a relative or friend out of town. This extra copy is free for the asking by writing or by calling at this office. Or if preferred, we w'll send free copies to such former residents as you may designate.

THINGS TO BE DONE IN OCT.

Destroy Grasshopper Eggs.

Now is the time to deal the grasshopper pest a telling blow. Disc, or preferably plow, land which is known to harbor hopper eggs before the ground freezes. When treated in this manner but few of the eggs w'll survive the winter.

Cows Should Freshen Now

Cows should freshen this month if the cream check is to reach its maximum during the coming winter months. The cow should be dry for six weeks, at least, before freshening. The calf should be taught to drink before it is three days old and should receive from eight to twelve pounds of whole milk per day, preferably from the dam. A calf under three weeks old w'll not do well on skim-milk and will after that age only when supplemented by grain ration.

Dig Out Barberry.

To save next years wheat crop, the common barberry should be distroyed this month, before the ground freezes In many cases the barberry bushes have been hacked off above ground but the roots still live. If the roots are not dug up now they will sprout again next spring when the farm work will be too heavy to permit of digging them. In the spring the black stem rust infection leaves the barberry and goes to the small grains All preventive work should be done before this stage is reached.

Look Over The Drainage Syestem

October is the month to look over the tile drainage syestems to see that they are going into the winter in good shape and will be ready for business early in the spring. The cutlet of each system should be absolutely clear of any obstruction. If there is an open ditch at the outlet it should be burned out clean this fall so that little snow will lodge in it during the winter. Snow blowing into a small open ditch becomes ice before spring and this ice must melt out before the the ditch will open up to full carr'ng capacity.

County Banks Long Way From Being "Busted"

Statements Of Various Banks Of County Show They Are In Good Condition

DEPOSITS OF OVER 6,500,000

The News had an article last week giving the total deposits of the various banks of the county, which figured up to six and one-half million dollars. The totals as given by the News, for the respective towns, was as follows:

Clarion	$1,578,625.66
Eagle Grove	1,752,435.66
Dows	1,066,265.84
Goldfield	615,079.98
Belmond	815,041.67
Woolstock	365,465.99
Rowan	319,236.68
Galt	92,378.34
Total for county	$6,945,589.82

This does not include deposits or "bills payable, rediscounts," of the private bank at Galt and the private bank at Holmes, but does include both items of the Bank of Clarion, a private bank.

From the looks of this statement the banks of Wright county may be short of ready cash but they are a long, long ways from being broke or even bent.

COURT HOUSE ITEMS

News: District court convenes in Clarion Monday morning (this week) and a busy session is expected, the docket being filled with civil suits and there are several criminal cases docketed which will occupy considerable time if they are tried.

The center of interest on the criminal docket is the prosecution of John Berg, the Belmond bank defaulter whose illness gained for him a continuance at the May term. Unless something unforseen occurs this case will probably be set for trial early in the session.

Other criminal cases up are the State against Herbert Bige, Roy Fortune and Oscar Jones, alleged to have robbed the Wheeler store at Woolstock and the Charlston & Holt clothing store at Goldfield.

The State against Pauline Knuth, alleged accomplice of the man who stole the Middleton truck at Eagle Grove last spring, is also on the docket.

Manuel Lopez and Nellie Tunnell of Dows, charged with adultry, are also facing trial, as is George Moore charged with having stolen some harness; Merle Snyder and Alva Vinton, charged with theft of tires at Eagle Grove. Arthur Rasmussen, who is alleged to have stolen the family automobile, is also facing trial for the theft, his father having signed the information.

Liquor cases likely to be heard are those of the State against Harry Jackson, charged with selling; Clarence Martin, illegal transportation, Perle Nelson, "nuisance," John Matthews "nuisance," John Ruhl, "nuisance."

W. V. Johnson is charged with forgery and N. H. Murphy, a check artist from Eagle Grove, also facing trial.

Oscar Crawford faces trial for assault on "Dr." Boyd, late of Clarion. The case grew out of Crawford's energetic method of collecting a "loan" made to the doctor, who had his choice of paying or taking a whipping. He paid with a check, which later was not honored for lack of funds, and he had Crawford arrested. Crawford also appeals from the Mayor's court of Clarion on a gambling charge.

Clerk Goslin says 150 new cases are on the docket this term of court —a record breaker. At least 100 of them are dinky suits on notes and accounts. A few are suits arising out of the land boom and speculative craze.

HOME TOWN PAPER WEEK

Every Four Corners has its Home Town week now-a-days, but all the boys and girls who have wandered from the Township Center cannot get back to enjoy the loved surroundings. But all can subscribe to the old home town paper and thus keep well in touch with the little spot they once called home.

What joy to run over the school promotions and find that the tots of a few years ago are moving higher and higher in scholastic circles and eventually blossom forth as the "sweet girl graduates," or the clean strong boys discarding knickers.

Just watch that hardened old city codger open up his home paper—it is the first thing he picks out of his bunch of mail—and what can he find there to interest him? Angus McGugan's horse died yesterday; Peter McGregor will run for the county clerkship; Horace Jell hopes to win the secretaryship of the Hilltown agricultural society; Lydia Munger has opened a millinery store in one side of the printing office; Mrs. Brown lost her hand satchel in the butchery; Dr. Dorland is attending Clara Brown who is down with a severe cold; Mrs. Plater broke her ankle an is in the county hospital.

Yet though he smiles at the old-time styles and expressions he enjoys it all over and over again, for it takes his mind back home where his wonderful boyhood days—happy days—were spent.

PREDICTS COAL FAMINE COMING

Washington, D. C., Oct. 6.—The gravest coal crisis confronting the nation in years is due within the next sixty days, experts forecast today.

Nothing short of coal famine during the winter faces the middle west and northwest, which are supplied by the bituminous coal fields, according to present indications.

The weekly production of bituminous coal has been nearly 2,500,000 tons short of normal. When the "rush season" begins, which will be about the middle or end of October, railroads will not have enough cars to move coal, it is predicted.

"From then on it will be a question of transportation," Said John E. Pratt, of the National Coal association, today. "There has been a shortage of cars for the past three years. There is no possibility of the railroads getting enough cars to supply the demand for winter coal. In the middle west and the northwest it will be impossible to relieve the suffering that will result. The householder will be affected as well as industries.

"There will not be enough coal moved to keep street car and electric light plants going.

"Prices always rise when there is a shortage in any commodity," he added.

NO DANCES FOR BABIES AT LAKE MILLS

All young men under the age of 21 years will henceforth be prohibited from attending public dances in Lake Mills, as will also young ladies who are under the age of 18.

The city council of that place at a recent meeting passed an ordinance requiring promotors of public dances to secure a license and defining the regulations of same, with a charge for the license of $6.00.

The ordinance requires a number of things, and regulates the hours in which dances may be held, the age of the young people who may attend, the conduct of the dancers who do attend, and in every way possible puts a ban on the old time dance where "anything goes."

"Comment on the new regulations all seem to simmer down to the opinion that the young folks at public dances have brought the "verdict of the court" upon themselves thru their actions at dances and the liberties they have taken at them in the past.

Boys and girls become accustomed to going thru "antics" at public dances that a few years ago would have been considered absolutely immoral, the new dances and liberties becoming so common that many young folks enter into them for the reason that "everybody's doing it." No more of it at Lake Mills say the city authorities.

BUICK DRIVER IN RIERSON ACCIDENT MAY SUE

The following item taken from the Humboldt Republican, will be of interest to local people, as it concerns one of the parties connected with the unfortunate and untimely death of Eddie Rierson recently:

W. G. Grader, the man who was driving the Buick car in the recent auto mishap south of Humboldt, in which the man from Thor was killed has stated that he will ask damages of the Northern Iowa Gas and Power Company for the damage done his car. Mr. Grader states that he was driving on the right side of the road where he should be, and that he had given plenty of roadway to the other parties to the mishap. He feels that he should be recompensed for his loss and expects to make such request through the court.

We have also heard it hinted that there was talk of the relatives of the man who was killed in the mishap asking damages. The whole matter seems to us to be a knotty problem. There was certainly some one to blame for the death and destruction and opinions differ as to the guilty party.—Humboldt Republican.

W. V. POLMATEER

W. V. Polmateer passed away at the old soldiers home in Marshalltown last Thursday. He had been ill for several years, but not bedfast until the last few months. Dropsy and heart trouble made his last days very trying. He was cared for at home until a few weeks since when he was removed to the Old Soldiers home for special treatment. He seemed to improve under new treatment, but this was only for the time. His death removes a respected pioneer, a brave vetern of the Civil war, a genial neighbor and friend— a man devoted to his home. The funeral was under the auspices of the American Legion—a military funeral—fitting services in memory of the deceased. His burial was from the home in Glenwood cemetery Saturday afternoon. The family bereaved are his wife, one daughter Mrs. Dan Matheson of Goldfield and three sons, Lou of Luverene, Minn., Ira of Stilson, Texas, and C. A. of this place.—Monitor.

W. H. Adams and wife expect to leave the last of this week for their future home in Ohio. Belmond citizens will hate to see them leave, for they have been among our most prominent and progressive citizens.

THOMPSON-PATTERSON

At 9:30 o'clock on Thursday morning, Sept. 29, at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Thompson, 123 So. 13th St., Ft. Dodge occured the marriage of Miss Maude Elder Thompson to Mr. O. R. Patterson of San Marcos, Texas. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. S. U. Leinbach, pastor of the Sands Memorial Congregational church at Belmond. The ceremony was witnessed by members of the immediate family and a few close friends. Following the ceremony the couple left on the 10:55 train for Chicago, where they will spend a few days. They will return to Ft. Dodge where they will visit, and spend a few days at various points in Iowa before going to their future home at San Marcos, Texas.

The bride is a graduate of the Belmond high school, the Iowa State Teachers College and the University of Chicago. For two years she taught in the Iowa State Teachers College, during which time she did extension work thruout the state. For the past two years she has been the director of the home economics department of the Southwest Texas State Normal college at San Marcos.

Mr. Patterson is a young business man of San Marcos, interested in the wholesale grocery business. He and his bride will be at home after November 1 at San Marcos.

Out of town guests who attended the wedding were Mr. and Mrs. G. F. Elder and daughter Marion, an Rev. Leinbach, of Belmond; Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Spooner and children of Storm Lake.

The Independent takes the greatest of pleasure in joining with the many Belmond friends in extending the best of wishes for a happy and prosperous life.

OLD TIME BELMOND BUSINESS MAN DIES

The following clipping from the Pocohantus Democrat tells of the recent death at that place of D. W. Colvin, who will be remembered by a number of Belmond people as having been a business man here many years ago, where he ran a restaurant. The Democrat says in part:

D. W. Colvin passed away at his home in the west part of town last Friday afternoon. He had been in poor health and a few weeks ago was taken with a severe attack of pneumonia and in his weakened condition was unable to withstand the severity of that dreded disease.

David William Colvin was born at Waterford, Ohio, Aug. 31, 1866 and died at his home in Pocohantus, Iowa Sept 23, 1921 at the age of 55 years and 23 days. He was united in marriage to Hattie Forrest at Waterford Ohio in March 1887. After 34 years this happy union was broken by the death of Mrs. Colvin. The parting however, was not long, for he was preceeded by her only 5 months and 23 days.

In the fall of 1900 the deceased came to Pocohantus to continue in the mercantile trade and for seventeen years of continuous business establish-ed in this community a record of lean, honest integrity.

About four years ago his health was broken, gradually he failed until silently without a struggle he responded to the summons and the spirit took its flight.

The funeral was held from the home here and services were conducted in the M. E. church and at the grave.

KEEP EVERLASTINGLY AT IT.

The writer does not claim to know how to conduct a store, but we do know that it requires publicity to conduct one successfully. If the merchants will all dress their windows so they will remind the winter shopper that he or she read an advertisement that corresponded with the window in the current issue of the Independent that window shopper will, almost invariable, become a customer —perhaps not always all of the goods mentioned in the ad, are shown in the window, but he or she will have been "doubly reminded" and will at least make some inquiries When inquiries begin to come, the advertisement has done its duty, and salesmanship must be resorted to.

HIGH SCHOOL ARRANGES FOR FINE PROGRAM

Season Tickets Now On Sale And Town Should Buy And Boost For The School

BATTLE WITH KANAWHA

Two Ancient Rivals To Scrap Again On Ball Diamond Here Friday P. M.

October 20—Alton Packard, Cartoonist.

Dec. 15—Stone Platt, Musical.

Jan. 16—Fine Arts, Musical.

Feb. 24—John Rato, Impersonator.

These four high class numbers will be given at the high school auditorium at a cost of $400.00. Season tickets are now on sale at $1.50 each. These tickets are transferable. It has been our endeavor to bring something worth while to Belmond this winter and we will need the loyal support of all. We could have engaged cheaper talent, but we believe that quality not quantity is desired.

When the high school students call on you, be ready to get your season tickets. Show them that you believe in bringing good clean entertainment to Belmond for all.

Friday, Oct. 7, the Belmond high school will play Kanawha at 4:00. You know what the Kanawha town team did to the locals the last few games this summer. Well, our high school boys are out for Belmond's record of clean hard playing and they expect to show the Kanawha boys that Belmond can play ball.

Fine Arts, Musical

If you want to see a good clean game, be at the ball park Friday afternoon. Our boys deserve your support this fall fully as much as the town team did this summer.

The more you boost for the boys, the better they play. This game will probably be the last game of the season on the home diamond.

BE A BOOSTER—COME OUT!

Belmond H. S. succeeded in trouncing Corwith a second time to a tune of 8 to 5. After allowing Corwith a lead of five scores in the early part of the game by loose playing, our boys tightened and came back strong in the 6th. They tied to score and in the seventh scored three more runs. The game was full of thrills from start to finish. The brilliant fielding and spectacular hitting of the locals was well worth seeing.

NORMAL TRAINING CLUB

The first meeting of the Normal Training club was held Saturday evening at the high school Alma Ruka was re-elected president, Ennis Allen vice president, and Elaine Rierson as secretary and treasurer. The following standing committees were appointed:

Refreshment: Frances Baker, Minnie Madson, Ennis Allen.

Program: Grace Allen, Mildred Parsons, and Elaine Rierson.

Look-out: Ethyl Thompson, Leona Rierson, Inez Boughton.

After the business meeting an informal discussion of teaching problems was held, followed by a social meeting and refreshments. A number of new members were present.

Every member should plan to be pesent at the next meeting which will be in three weeks.

Dr. Ayres of Columbia University, New York, has made a study of the spelling ability of several thousand children in about one hundred schools of the United States, from the one room rural school to the city schools of New York. As a result of his study, he has tabulated a number of words and the percent that pupils of different grades should make in taking the test. If they have average spelling ability.

This test was given the grade pupils the latter part of last week by Supt. Fyler, and the results show that as far as spelling ability is concerned we have some 4th and 5th grade pupils who could be classified as seventh and eighth grades, and we also find that some of the seventh and eighth graders have only the spelling ability of the 4th or 5th grades, according to the Ayres standard. These pupils with low spelling ability will need to work harder, and get up to standard. Tests will be given again next semester, using different words.

CHURCH NOTES

CONGREGATIONAL
Rev. S. U. Leinbach, Pastor.

Last Sunday was the first Sunday of the new quarter and we are back to normal but we hope to raise it way above that po'nt this quarter. Let us make it the best quarter of the year. We can do it if we will but try.

The Ladies Aid will meet in the church parlors Wednesday to tie comforts. Prof. Critchley of Ellsworth College will be here on Oct. 16 to give the Passion Play which he was privileged to see in 1910. People go from all over the world to see the pictures which were taken while it was being enacted. Put this date on your calander and be there with a good big silver offering which will go for the spread of the Gospel in other lands.

Services for next Sunday are—Sabbath school at 10 a. m. Morning worship at 11:00 and the evening services under the guidance of the young people at 7:30. Miss Marjorie Williams will be the leader.

Rapidly the work of high prices goes on—weaning the public away from meat. What if meat should never come back after the people have become accustomed to something else?

Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

TEN PAGES AND 1,100 CIRCULATION.

The Independent this week comes to you in its new form: ten pages and eleven hundred circulation. That is what it will be each week henceforth, an we hope to increase the circulation to 1,200 before many months have gone by.

The Independent has now the largest circulation of any newspaper that has ever been published in Belmond. Naturally the whole force feels more or less proud of that fact, and will endeavor to make the Independent a better newspaper all around.

The extra pages for the Meservey section do not take away from the usual amount of reading that the Independent has carried, but instead adds the two extra pages to each issue, making that much more reading matter for our subscribers. If you have relatives or friends at Meservey, the Meservey section will interest you, and whether you have or not the news contained in the two extra pages will often be of interest in a variety of other ways.

The Meservey people who will receive the Independent, will be getting their home news, more of it, and in addition the eight regular pages that the Independent carries each week, so that they will have the best news medium in their section of the country.

The Belmond business man and the Belmond merchant gets an additional circulation of several hundred from which to draw trade—for the circulation which has been added to the Indepenent is local, not foregin; over 90 per cent of the added circulation is within 15 miles of Belmond, and a large share of the 90 per cent is much closer than that. Of the entire circulation of the Independent, the publisher guarantees that 90 per cent is within Belmond's trading radius.

The Meservey business man is given the opportunity to reach the same number of people whom he previously reached thru the Register, and in addition many more who are within his trading territory. While the entire circulation of the Independent may not be of advantage to him, he nevertheless will reach many more than he has been reaching.

The publisher sincerely hopes that both towns will be given better service and satisfaction; that the readers of both places will be given more news and the advertisers a larger field; unless this is so, our object and plans will have been in vain.

THE TIGHTNESS OF THE ALMIGHTY DOLLAR"

That money is tight is no news; neither is it more than the smallest child knows. But the fact that it is tight has many peculiar angles and interesting features.

The writer, in talking with Rufus Morse recently, heard an unusual tale. Rufus has been acting as traveling agent for a map company during his summer vacation from college, and he told of selling a map to each of two of the most prominent attorneys in the city of Cedar Rapids. When he came to deliver them, the attorneys looked up their bank balance and found that they didn't have the price, $3.95. They asked for two weeks time to pay.

A local merchant told the writer on last Saturday that his business was running a hundred dollars a day and better, making three thousand a month total sales. This was the cash business; the book accounts were not included. His trade is partly town, partly country, with a smattering in the nearby towns.

A local business man went into the country one day recently to collect an even eight hundred dollars. He drove all day and collected exactly eight dollars.

One merchant said that the so-called "dead beets" were his best cash customers right now—they had to pay cash and pay promptly, or there was nothing doing.

A near-by banker said the savings accounts at his bank had increased 25 per cent in the past six mosths. Another said that during the war they never had more than a few dollars in pennies in the vault, and now they had almost $150 in pennies that had been brought n.

It took one business man here three months to collect a $12 account from a sound, well-established firm. They simply couldn't spare the cash.

There is a heap of money in this country, that goes without saying, but nobody in this part of the timber appears to have any. Where is it? In the hands of the big bugs in the East. And they propose to hold on to it. To let any of it go would be to let the farmers get ahold of some, and that is the last thing that they desire. The farmer can't get any money; he therefore won't buy more than he has to have; he can't pay his debts. banks don't get any money there, the merchant can't borrow because the banks haven't the coin, the business falls off all around and every fellow stalls off the next one. It's a great life if you don't weaken, but this merry-go-round has got to stop sometime, and the outlook right now from different sources seems to indicate that it was running out of steam and a new ride was about to commence.

Here's hoping, anyway. Co-operation and mutual help will bring the country thru all right, and the calamity howler is out of place; you never make friends nor bring business by hollering and complaining.

In our items from the Signal of twenty years ago which are published this week, the news of Fred Blackstone being made secretary of the local school board appears. Fred has been secretary all these years, and is still hold'ng the job. The hog sale last Wednesday was quite a success. Messrs. Ray Durant, Christ'an Rasmussen and Walter Kester offered thirty spring boars and ten spring gilts of the Duroc breed, and most of them sold at fair prices. Some of them sold well and others went at less than they should have sold for. The gentleman who held the sale are satisfied with their sale. If they did not get as much money as they should, they are helping to bu'ld up better herds in this neighborhood, as most of the offerings went to local buyers.—Reporter.

Do You Know The Advantages Of Your Town

Local Man Writes Interesting History Of Meservey And Its Business Houses

MORE HOMES ARE NEEDED

Meservey has a population of about 300, has a 24 hour electric light service, and water works system. Has well kept lawns and substantial homes. It has never been strong for free advertising through newspapers and ther sources, being contented to be what we are instead of making people believe what we are not. It business men and citizens are contented and prosperous, are inclined to be more godly than ungodly. We have few knockers and those that remain are well known and little attention is paid to them. Our business men believe that too many in the same line of business is not good for the customer so one business place of each kind is the rule except that we have two general stores. Most all of our business firms have been long established which proves that they are prosperous and gave their customers the most for their money.

The H. J. Klemme Lumber Company and the Meservey elevator have been under the same ownership since the 80's. The Farmers Savings Bank has practically the same directors and officers since its organization in 1904. H. Fischer started in business in Meservey in 1899. In 1908 he purchased the Daylight store from D. Mosher who had run the business since 1892. The Hulsebus Muller store was started by T. S. Hulsebus in 1898. E. A. Strasburg has been in the drug business here since 1907. Dr. Agler has been here about the same length of time. C. J. Wendel, our hardware man, has been in business about two years taking the business over from H. K. Pals, who started the business in 1907 with H. Fischer as his pardner, C. E. Brogan has been with what is now the Moore Grain Company for about 14 years. G. E. Raecker has had charge of the Meservey garage for the past 8 years. Heinie has kept our citizens looking more respectable for the past 8 years and says his razors are always sharp and never pull. H. A. Kofoed has been in the meat business here for over 5 years. Meservey has no creamery but is well supplied with cream stations. C. E. Brogan buys for the Lindenhurst Dairy, H. A. Kofoed for E. B. Higley, and Henry Proost for the Fairmont Creamery. M. A. Smith has had charge of the postoffice for the past 8 years. The rest of our business firms are somewhat younger. Harry T. Smith runs the blacksmith shop, Paul Willer repairs shoes and L. Jones feeds the hungry. Our newest business firm deals in old army shoes, selling them for 25 cents to$1.50 per pair.

It is very seldom that we have a vacant house. Just now one dwelling has been vacant for two weeks. What we need is more homes. Meservey extends an invitation, to those who wish to retre and others, to come and build homes to suit themselves. You are more than welcome.

A HUMAN INTEREST STORY

Good news for hunters: the almost extinct prairie chickens are getting more plentiful.

Christ Christensen, a tiler on the L. Janssen farm three miles north of Meservey, claims to have the only pet prairie chicken in the state.

During the hot summer months when water was scarce Christensen noticed that a prairie chicken followed his work closely apparently trying to get moisture out of the dirt thrown out of the ditch, so the next day at noon he brought a dish and watered his pet, and at noon he divided his dinner with it. The chicken is now so tame that he can be petted, roosts on the car fender, and keeps Mr. Christensen company during his hard labors in the tile ditch. When a stranger approaches Mr. Chicken is as wild as it ever was.

Prairie chickens are protected by law until 1922.

It is believed that the large number of marriage licenses taken out recently is caused by the financial depression—some must believe that two can live as cheaply as one. Someone might work this problem in Alegebra. Let X - 2, etc.

PUBLISHER'S ANNOUNCEMENT

The Meservey Register comes to you this week in its new form, combined with the Belmond Independent. How do you like it? We hope that you will like it, and that you will co-operate with the publisher and the Meservey correspondent and business manager, in making the Register a better and more newsy paper.

Instead of the four pages of the old Register, you are now getting ten pages, and we believe that you will find as much or more home news in the Register this week as you have ever had in the old paper. To make the Register a better paper we must ask your co-operation. We want you to have the best possible paper with the largest possible amount of home news, and if you will help us and the Meservey correspondent and business manager, you will get it.

To those business men and citizens of Meservey who have co-operated with us in arranging the various matters incidental to the change in ownership, we desire to express our thanks. They have aided us in every posible way and we are sincerely grateful.

Those business men who are on the advertising contract will be given the best possible service and attention. That any others, who are not on but who may wish to join, the publisher will extend the time to Nov. 1 in which they can come in at the same rates that those now on are enjoying. After that date the occasional advertiser cannot expect as good a rate as the man who is signed up.

Help us and we'll help you. Nothing can be accomplished without co-operation, and upon your co-operatin we depend to give you a paper worth while.

WHO HAS THE BUSINESS?

"Heinie" the barber has full charge of all the business end of the Register at Meservey. He will handle all advertisements, job work and all subscriptions. Heinie will have a telephone just as soon as he gets squared around, so that he can be reached any time of day.

Mr. Rief is authorized to make any arrangements for your advertising, or for your job printing, and he wants your subscription to the Register. He will tell you all about it if you ask him, and Heinie can talk, too, if you have ever noticed.

The publisher feels that in Mr. Rief the man was found to fill the place. He will collect the copy for the Meservey ads, solicit the job work and attend to both new and renewal subscriptions.

Give your ads and job work to Mr. Rief. He will guarantee you that your business will receive prompt attention and that you will receive the best of work.

WHO HAS THE NEWS?

Miss Jennie Meinderts, at the telephone office, has full charge of all the Meservey news, ad we believe you will say, by the amount of items in the Meservey section this week, that she is a good one to have in charge.

But Miss Meinderts cannot secure all the news from your home town, no matter how hard she tries, and the readers of the Register can help her a great deal by telling her of any news that they know, by phoning it to her or writing. The Register wants to give you ALL the news, not part, and with your co-operation that is what will be done. A little help goes a long ways, sometimes, and means a great deal. You can be of assistance both to Miss Meinderts and the publisher if you will help to get the news. Every society and club should have the news of their meetings in the Register, as should the various church societies and fraternal societies.

Send, phone or tell the news to Miss Meinderts. Thank you!

FIRE PREVENTION TIME

The papers are full of fire prevention news and ideas now, and it would seem a good idea when the annual loss by fires in the country is considered. Cleaning up the rubbish, old boxes and papers from the back yard, the store building and the house cellar or basement may mean the saving of the business or the home.

The property loss each year runs into the millions of dollars, a large part of which could be saved by the use of a little labor and cleaning up of the truck which accumulates around any place more or less. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" and the time to prevent is now.

You can have all the Meservey news and the Belmond Independent delivered to you each week for only two dollars.

Ask "Heinie."

Rippling Rhymes

By Walt Mason

Great Chances

The mails with documents are loaded, describing snaps I ought to nail; by glib tongued salesman I am goaded and asked to dig my hard earned kale. For wealth untold I always hanker, and I'd be buying gold bricks strong, but for the wise old village banker who tells me when I'm headed wrong. He deals in coin, and coin's his study, he's wise to all investment tricks, and he explains in language ruddy, how games are played on easy hicks. When I approach the paying teller, to draw out all the coin in view, the banker leaders me to the cellar, and asks me what I plan to do. And when I say I am intending to buy an oil well down in Maine, he lectures me, much wisdom lending, until I'm safe and sane. He knows I have distored vision where money matters are concerned; I'm always having dreams elysian of roubles gained that were not earned. And so on me he's keeping cases, he shields me from the rich fake, when he beholds some hectic traces of punk investments I would make. Before the cold eyed village banker the glib and oly faker squ'rms; he is my helm, my git and spanker, if you'll forgive these sailor terms. He is my binnacle and anchor; my larboard watch and starboard clock; I owe it to the village banker that all my goods are not in hock.

STATE OF IOWA

Executive Department

A PROCLAMATION

By the Governor:

The universal observance of established regulations for the safeguarding of life and property was never so imperatively demanded as now when man and power and useful commodities are so vitally needed to relieve the distress of the world. Reliable records indicate that the destruction by fires, a vast number of which are preventable, involve an annual loss in the United States of thirty thousand human lives and three hundred fifty millions of property. Much of this enormous waste can be avoided by the adoption of proper precautions throughout the country.

In order that the attention of the people, as a whole, may be concentrated upon this immensely important subject, I do here by designate and I earnestly recommend that it be generally observed by the public officials, civic organizations, educational institutions and private individuals, to the end that life may be saved and property conserved for the beneficent uses of mankind. I particularly invoke the assistance of the schools of the State as the most effective agencies of enlightenment and reform in our country, and I enjoin that a portion of the day be devoted to instruction of the children who attend them in the matter of fire cause and the method of fire prevention. Realizing the potential influence of the press, I especially request the generous support of the newspapers in forwarding the purposes for which the day is designated.

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the Great Seal of the State of Iowa.

Done at Des Moines this 1st day of September, 1921.

(SEAL) N. E. KENDALL,
Governor.

Attest:
W. C. Ramsay,
Secretary of State.

BRITT AUTO RUNS DOWN AGED MAN IN MINN.

While driving on the Jefferson Highway near Geneva, Minn., last Friday C. L. Palmer of Britt struck and killed an aged man. H. K. Allis was the old gentleman's name, and he was 88 years of age. He was walking down the road and Mr. Palmer did not see him on account of another car, and the accident was unavoidable. The body of the old gentleman was thrown 20 feet, his skull was fractured and he evidently died instantly.

Mr Palmer took the body to the home of a daughter and summoned medical aid, but nothing could be done to revive him. Mr. Palmer came on home later.

The authorities said that Mr. Palmer was not at all to blame for the accident, and no inquest was held.

The deceased is the father of George Allis who operates the Wilson Hotel at Albert Lea.—Signal.

A Harbinger of Evil.

An eminent Norwegian prophesies that the United States will soon be overrun with bolsheviki and in the grip of the red terror. Pleasant prospect! Having failed dismally in Russia after reducing that country to ruin and starvation, it is but natural that the red hordes should seek for new fields to conquer—and there is none fairer than ours. The danger lies not on the power of the bolsheviki, but rather in our own indefference.

It is difficult for the average American to conceive that any power under the sun could upset our established order of government. The autocratic czar of Russia probably felt much the same—until he ceased to be either an autocrat or a czar.

The strongest of stone walls will crumble and fall if the foundations are persistently undermined. It is so with governments, and even our own is not immune. For six years or more we have wittnessed an orgy of profiteering and gouging and plundering such as has never been dreamed of before. Money lust drove an otherwise sane public mad, and it is only partially recovering today. Laws of restriction and correction we have, but they are too often looked upon as applicable to the other fellow and not to ourself.

Such a condition, stretching over a long period of time, affords the bolsheviki to spread resentment and discontent, two important factors which are preliminaries to every revolution.

Instead of smiling at the learned Norwegian who warns us of impending evil we would do well to give his words serious consideration, lest the time come when it is too late to consider.—Exchange.

The West Bend ball team, an all-salaried outfit, are reported to have lost their backers some thousands of cold cash this summer. They won a majority of the games played, but the expense of salaries was greater than the income. An all-salaried ball team will not pay in the small town, and does not draw the interest of the people as does one which is composed for the most part at least of home men. That has been the experience of all towns around who hired a fast team this year. They may play better ball but they don't get the crowds.

The local school team aims to do better than the town team did this summer with Kanawha, and when they meet the Kanawha school team here Friday keep the bacon at home. The two teams will battle on the Belmond diamond on Friday afternoon of this week.

FARM BUREAU NEWS ITEMS

HIGH SALARY PROPAGANDA

The American Farm Bureau federation is being criticised most severely by a certair so-called farm paper fer having at the head of its organization what it terms big-salaried or overpaid officer.

It is true that James Howard, president of the American Farm Bureau federation, receives a salary of $15,000 per year. And we believe he earns his salary, every cent of it. Did you ever stop to think how much of Mr. Howard's salary is taken from your individual $5 membership fee? Estimating the total membership in the American Farm Bureau federation at 1,500,000 members, which is the approximate number at present, it costs you just one cent per year to help pay Mr. Howard's salary. Now, if there is a single farm bureau member in Wright county who feels that he cannot afford to pay one cent per year towards the support of Mr. Howard's salary, or who feels that his one cent is being ill spent we would like to have him ask for his money back.

It would be difficult to point to a single commercial or industrial organization in the U. S. organized on a nation-wide basis as the farm bureau federation is, which does not have at its head an officer who is paid a salary which would amount to five or ten times as much as that received by Mr. Howard. Indeed, other organizations which have real executives to direct the affairs of their concerns pay their officers and pay them well. Every organization must realize sooner or later that it must pay for executive ability and the American farm bureau federation has long since realized the unusual ability of Mr. Howard as a leader; hence, his salary of $15,000 per annum. In a comparative way taking into consideration the service rendered by Mr. Howard compared with the accomplishments of the executives of certain other commercial and industrial organizations Mr. Howard is the poorest paid officer in the whole line-up.

GIRLS' CLUB RALLY OCT. 29TH

On Saturday, Oct. 29th, the girls' clubs of Wright county are holding an all day rally at Clarion under the leadership of Miss Hazel Spencer, the county club leader, with the assistance of Miss Josephine Arnquist, state leader of girls' club work. The program will begin at 10 a. m. at the Colonial theatre, where moving pictures showing materials used in making girls' garments will be shown. Thru the kindness of W. F. Smith, proprietor of the theatre, arrangements have been made for showing pictures for part of the program. A banquet will be held during the noon hour in the parlors of the Methodist church. The girl club members will invite as their guests, their parents and the members of the board of directors of our local farm bureau. Each club president is asked to make all necessary arrangements for dishes and silverware for serving the members and guests of her particular club. Each club member is asked to bring enough for herself and one or two guests so that all visitors will be served at dinner.

A play tournament is being arranged for the recreation of the youngsters at this rally. The committee having the tournament in charge consists of Miss Violet Lukens, Miss Gladys Smith and Miss Amy Benson. This tournament will undoubtedly furnish plenty of action for the entire day. The feature of the program will probably be the so-called club stunts which will be staged by the various clubs in the county. Each club is asked to arrange a list of stunts and report to the stunt committee consisting of Miss Thora Larsen and Miss Nesa Howiseon.

The club stunts will be followed by an adrress from Miss Josephine Arnquist, state leader of girls' club work. Miss Arnquist has taken a personal interest in the developement of club work in Wright county and she will no doubt have some splendid suggestions for the club leader and every director on the farm bureau board should make a supreme effort to hear Miss Arnquist on Oct. 29.

FIGURES DON'T LIE

It will be remembered a series of poultry culling demonstrations was staged in the county during the latter part of July and the fore part of August when three demonstrations were held in each township in the county.

The farm ladies at whose places these demonstrations were held were asked to keep an egg record fourteen days previous to the time of culling, also for a period of 14 days after the culling operation and the summary gives the following results:

No. hens before culling	3,521
No. hens after culling	2,605
No. hens culled out	916
No. eggs before culling	14,898
No. eggs after culling	14,457

These figures indicate that 26 per cent of the hens in the 48 flocks which were culled in the county were thrown out as non-egg layers while the egg production was not reduced less than four per cent. It may be said also that these figures were sent in by the ladies themselves and for that reason are correct. Look these figures over and remember "figures don't lie," and then judge for yourself whether or not the poultry culling work has been a success in Wright county for the 1921 season.

WOOL SHIPMENTS OCT. 8

Farmers who were unable to ship their wool on the date of the consignment last July because of the busy season or for any other reason will be glad to know that arrangements have been made for a second shipment to clean up all wool in Wright county.

Those who have not shipped their wool and would like to get in on this shipment are asked to tie their wool with regular wool twine, pack in regulation wool sacks and bring to Clarion on Saturday, Oct. 8, when the shipment will be made.

PICK YOUR SEED CORN EARLY

This is the time of year when the farmer should be reminded of the necessity of picking his seed corn before the first killing frost. This is old stuff but most of us realize the importance of having good seed corn when corn planting time arrives each year.

Every farmer should make a special effort to pick his seed corn early so that he will be able to select the early maturing ears of the best breeding type. We all realize the danger in waiting for corn husking time to select the seed corn which we expect to raise a bumper crop from the following year.

WHAT WILL YOU PAY PICKERS?

Altho no definite uniform price for corn husking has been established it seems to be quite generally agreed in Wright county and the surrounding counties that the following schedule of wages will be reasonable for the 1921 season: Three cents per bushel where the corn is standing well, and the elevator is used. Three and one-half cents per bushel where the corn is standing well and no elevator is used, and possibly four cents per bushel in cases where the corn has been blown down badly.

Representative farmers from each township in Wright county have met and discussed the price for picking this year and the above schedule is the one agreed upon after all things were taken into consideration.

GIVE HOGS PLENTY OF WATER

Water for hogs, while not a food, will help make fat on the hog as quickly as any other one thing fed, says John Evvard, swine expert with the Iowa Agricultural experment station. Water is necessary in digestion, since it acts as a solvent, a regulator, a transporter and a cleanser and a tonic to the hog's body.

Many foods have a large quantity of water in them, such as mangels, which have 9 pounds of water to one pound of dry matter but the majority of hog feeds are less than 25 per cent water.

Since the water is necessary in the chemical action of starches and sugars which make fats it is necessary that hogs have plenty of water if they are to get their fat in the most economical manner.

Where hogs do not get a good supply of fresh water they will worry and this reduces their flesh. Hogs have a comparatively small stomach and cannot drink large quantities of water at a time so that they should be given a chance to drink frequently.

Where plenty of water is furnished the hogs will be healthier since water carries off the poisonous waste products in the body building processes of the body. Although a hog is considered one of the dirtiest animals, he likes clean water and he must have it if best results are desired.

The rule is that if the office seeks the man isn't much of an office.

THINGS TO BE DONE IN OCTOBER

Fall Plowing Pays.

When the potatoes are marketed and the seed corn is all hung, the wise farmer plans to do as much fall plowing as possible before freezing. This is mighty good pratice to break up insect nests and it is good farm management to get as much of the work out of the way as possible before spring. It also enables early seeding of grain, which means increasing yields.

A Winter Reading Course

Winter is coming when the family will have much more time to read. The home town paper will keep them informed as to local happenings, a good daily paper will tell the latest state, national and world news, and a good farm paper will give the latest ideas in the field of agriculture. Some of the breed and poultry journals also offer excellent reading matter to the farmer who specializes.

Club Members Report

All bread, canning and sewing club reports and achievement stories should be sent to the county club leader, home demonstration agent, or county agent before October 15. These should be forwarded to the state club leader at State college before October 30. In countries where there is no agent the report and stories may be sent directly to the state club leader's office. Plans for reorganization of clubs and taking in new members should be made during October.

Women Plan Program

October is the month when the women of the community should plau a definite program of work for the winter months. The State college at Brookings has for women extension specialists who are at the service of community organizations—a clothing specialist, state leader of the home demonstration work, and poultry specialist.

Weed Out The Flock

Now is the time to take an inventory of the young poultry stock and weed out the weaklings and undeveloped pullets; also cockerels not needed for breeding porposes. Pullets to be retained should be examined for lice, disease and deformities and all undesirable birds removed. The selected individuals should be transferred to winter laying quarters which have been previously prepared for them. Young stock should never be housed in a building used for the older stock with out first giving it a thorough cleaning and disinfecting.

"YOUR LIGHTS ARE BURNING, MISTER!"

"Your lights are burning, Mister—Yes, I know it," is an inscription which will be seen on more than one automobile in the coming year. At least, until the remainder of the motoring public come to realize that a car with burning headlights is not the result of an all night joy ride or accidental turning of the light switch. One driver threatened to use such a sign when told by a battery service man that long day-time trips and high charging rate of his generator under such conditions meant certain disaster for the storage battery on his car unless he burned the lights.

In that espect at least, the European name "Accumulator" by which storage batteries are known over there is more literally correct. An automobile battery merely accumulates the surplus electricity developed by the generator and when that current becomes excessive, the work done in the battery (and it is just as much work for a battery to take a charge as it is to give it off) becomes a burden to it and overheating results.

Most car owners know by this time that overheating means buckled plates destruction of certain kinds of insulation materials commonly used and short circuits. Escape from this danger may be had by burning the headlights while on long day trips, particularly when a recent test has shown the battery to be fully charged.

The Willard Storage Battery Co. strikes a timely note of warning in their latest booklet, entitled, "Willard Service; For Your Battery's Benefit —and Yours." They say never allow your battery to become overheated in service; keep all cells filled with distilled water; keep your battery fully charged in winter to prevent freezing; The battery will then take care of itself.

NEAR EAST RELIEF GRAIN CAMPAIGN

E. E. Barclay, of Des Moines, special representive for the grain campaign of the Near East Relief, while here last Thursday made a talk at the picnic held at Shrover's grove and his appeal was rewarded by liberal donations of corn from farmers in attendance.

The townships vice presidents will receive pledges from the farmer in their township of old and new corn, wheat, oats, barley, or rye. These donations are to be taken to the elevator most convenient to the donor, on or before Saturday, October 8, 1921, which has been designated as "Grain day for Franklin County." The grain will be receiped for by the elevator to the donor and credit slips for the grain will be turned into the township vice president who will advise W. L. Robinson, county chairman, as to the amount and kind of grain and location of elevator where held.

The Near East Relief will then gather the credits at a certain shipping point, furnish cars and shipping instructions and forward grain to mills for preparation as food products for shipping overseas. All expenses of movement of grain from Franklin county have been provided for so that no expense will attach to the donations. The mills handle two thousand cars of corn free of cost, and the railroads furnish free transportation from mill to port.

Quick action on the part of our farmers who have old corn, wheat, oats or barley is necessary in order that these ships may reach the Black Sea ports before the winter, as Governor Kendall in his proclamation says: "Men, women and children are literally starving to death." We can save some of them. Those who wish to give money to buy corn products will send their contributions through the same channels.

Those who do not have old corn and are willing to pledge new corn after the 1921 crop is harvested will so specify on their pledges. Arrangements will be made for another grain day in November or December. The new corn will go to the southern ports during the winter.

No grain crop has been harvested in Armenia for five years; 400,000 of their men lost their lives during the war on the side of the allies. A majority of the balance were massacred by the Turks and Kurds. The women and children of the bible lands are holding out guant fingers across the seas begging America for bread.

Five million bushels of grain are needed to meet this awful condition. Iowa's quota is 300 carloads of corn, five of wheat and two of barley. Franklin county's quota is three cars loads. It is estimated that there are 300,000 bushel of old corn in the county. An average of one bushel out of every hundred would meet our quota. Other counties in the state are doing this and we can do likewise.

Governor Kendall has issued the following proclamation:

To the farmers of Iowa:

A terrible situation confronts us in the bible lands. It is a race with death. Men, women and children are literally starving. A corn ship must leave America before Nov. 1st, to have its cargo reach Russian Armenia before the winter ice blockade. One hundred bushels of old corn are now worth ten thousand bushels of new corn in December. The will save lives that would otherwise be lost.

I beg the farmers of Iowa to heed this call. Take your donation of grain to your elevator this week and send your credit slip to our Near East Grain Company, 521 Securities building, Des Moines, Iowa.

N. E. Kendall,
Governor of Iowa.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

CHAPTER VI.—To get proper surgical aid, John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Dale convey "Babe," unconscious, to the city. Doctors assure them she is not seriously hurt. Dale meets an old friend, Bobby McLaurin, who had married Patricia Clavering. Telling his father of David Moreland's coal, the old gentleman's actions convince his son of his father's guilt in the killing of Moreland.

CHAPTER VII.—It is arranged that "Babe" is to stay with Mrs. McLaurin to be educated. Dale, refusing his father's proffered financial aid to develop the mine, interests Newton Wheatley, capitalist, who agrees to furnish the money. Dale realizes he loves "Babe."

"I don't know what ye'd do, pap," Babe said weakly. "You ought to thought o' that afore, pap. It may be too late now. I want ye to go on off and le' me alone. Ef I die, I want to die in peace. The Lord knows I never got to live in peace!"

There was a worried look in her wonderful brown eyes, and the doctor saw it. He strode forward decisively and helped Littleford to his feet. The hillman wiped away a tear with his faded blue bandana, and hung his head. He had been made a broken man in one day.

"Go out to your friend Moreland," smiled the doctor, "and wait there for a little while."

Babe's father walked unsteadily out of the room. Dale went to Doctor Braemer and whispered, "Isn't she going to make it?" anxiously.

"Certainly she's going to make it," Braemer assured him. "Go on; she wants to see you."

Dale drew a chair up close to the white bed and sat down. Babe's eyes lighted at once, and she put a hand uncertainly out toward him. Dale took the hand in his. He saw that it was a little pale under its delicate sunburn.

"Glad to see you, Babe," he told her softly. "Why do you think you're going to die, Babe?"

She smiled at him. "Why, I don't think I'm a-goin' to die," she said. "I know I'm a-goin' to live, Bill Dale. I feel like I could walk fifty miles right now!"

"But I heard you tell your father—"

"I was a-tryin' to skeer him out o' fightin' any more," she interrupted. "And I believe I 'bout done it, don't you?"

Dale was relieved. "I do. Is there anything you want, Babe? If there is, I'll get it for you if it's in the universe."

"The universe?" she repeated inquiringly. "What's the universe, Bill Dale? Somethin' to eat?"

"The world, the sun, the moon, and the stars."

She smiled at him again. "No," she said, "the' ain't nothin' I want, and ain't nothin' ye can do fo' me, I reckon."

"But I thought, as they sent for me—"

Babe Littleford's fingers held tightly to his. "It was me that sent fo' you."

She turned her face the other way. "I was so lonesome, Bill Dale!"

Robert McLaurin's wife, Patricia, visited Babe twice daily, and a friendship that was none the less warm for being unique sprang up quickly between them. Patricia declared to her husband that she was going to keep Babe—whom she was already calling by her proper name, the same being Elizabeth—and educate her. There was room in the bungalow, Patricia said; and she really needed company, because Bobby was away so much.

Babe accepted little Mrs. McLaurin's offer as soon as Bill Dale convinced her that she wouldn't be merely an object of charity. The hill pride's first law is that one must pay for what he gets—and it's probably the first law God laid down for old Adam in Eden. Ben Littleford seemed bewildered and blue when they told him of the arrangement, but he voiced no objection. Dale pressed upon him a loan of a hundred dollars, and ordered him to give it to his daughter, which he did. Elizabeth Littleford, of course, would need new clothing.

"I ain't even got any dresses at home," she whispered to Patricia, "but two."

Bill Dale was sure now that he loved Babe, and he was almost sure that she cared for him. But he was quite properly in no haste to come to an understanding. He had known all along that Babe would have to be educated! and a woman's tastes, he reasoned, might change with education. And he wanted her to have the opportunity of knowing other men of his class. If she couldn't love him with a lasting love, he didn't want her to love him at all.

Oddly or not, he never thought of Jimmy Fayne.

CHAPTER VIII.

Major Bradley and Henderson Goff.

When Bill Dale, the expert mining man Hayes and the two mountaineers stepped from a short passenger train at the Halfway switch, they were approached by the moonshiner, Heck, and a man whom Dale had never seen before. He was tall, and his bearing was erect and soldierlike, though he was every day of sixty years old. His eyes were blue and twinkling with everlasting good humor; his gray mustaches and imperial were exceedingly well cared for; his teeth were his own, and as white as a schoolgirl's, and they bore out his general air of neatness. He was, plainly, a Southerner of the old type.

"Who's that?" whispered Dale to John Moreland.

But Moreland didn't hear. He ran forward with his right hand outstretched, and so did Ben Littleford. Men could not have greeted a brother with more gladness, Dale thought.

"Hi, thar, Major Bradley!" the hillman cried. "And how d'ye come on today?"

"I am very well, gentlemen, thank you," said the major, smiling.

He shook their hands heartily. "The trainmen gave us your message yesterday," he went on, still smiling, "and we were delighted to learn that the young woman was out of danger. I trust you are all in good health, gentlemen."

They assured him that they were. Moreland turned to introduce Bill Dale and the mining man. From the moment that Major Bradley gripped Dale's hand they were friends.

"Mighty glad to know you, sir!" exclaimed the old lawyer. "I've been hearing a great deal about you, sir, over in the valley of the Doe. They seem to think there's nobody just like Bill Dale! It was Bill Dale this, and Bill Dale that; it was 'Here's where Bill Dale whipped Black Adam,' or, 'Here's where Bill Dale was standing when such-and-such happened,' or, 'Here's where Bill Dale crossed the fence!'"

"Hah-hah-hah!" sluggishly laughed By Heck, who stood leaning on the muzzle of his rifle. "Bill Dale is all right, major; ye've shore got my word fo' that."

The others laughed. Then John Moreland said they'd better be moving, or they'd be late for dinner.

When they had put a hundred yards of David Moreland's mountain behind them, the old Southerner tugged slyly at Dale's sleeve and whispered:

"Let us fall behind a little, if you please. I want to speak with you privately."

They began to lag, and soon there was a distance of several rods between them and the others.

"I heard through Addie Moreland," began Bradley, his friendly hand on the younger man's arm, "about you and what you're planning to do for the Morelands. I tell you, sir, I thanked heaven for your coming, and you may count on me to help in any way I can. The Morelands are quite friendly to me now, though up to the middle of last summer they didn't like me any too well because I made Ben Littleford's cabin my home when out here.

"It was a simple thing that brought us together. John Moreland's little nephew was lost in the woods and his mother was frantic. There are panthers, you know, and wildcats, rattlers, and copperheads. I was fortunate enough to find the boy, and carried him home. That was all. They're a fine people, my boy, and so are the Littlefords. Good old English blood that somehow wandered off. There's no purer, cleaner blood in America, sir.

"And now—how are you getting along with your plans for the operation of the coal mine?"

"Excellently," answered Dale. "We have the necessary finance; a geared locomotive and cars and light steel rails have been bargained for."

"Good!" Bradley gave Dale a hearty slap on the shoulder.

"There's something else I wanted to say, Mr. Dale," he continued, his voice grave. "You're nearly certain to have a barrel of trouble with a shyster coal man named Henderson Goff. He's a villain, sir, if ever there was one! And he's quite the smoothest article I've ever seen. He can make you believe black is white, if only you'll listen to him long enough."

"Is he—has he been here recently?" Dale wanted to know.

"He's here now," answered the major. "He's been here for three days, and he's been working devilment fast. He was up here last summer, trying to buy the Moreland coal for a song; he knows all the people, you see. As soon as he landed here on this present trip, he found out about your intentions. Then, at night, he freed Adam Ball from his tobacco barn prison, and went home with him.

"Well, By Heck followed them and did some eavesdropping—poor By has his strong points!" the major went on. "Goff learned that Adam Ball's father knew about the coal vein long before David Moreland discovered it and got lawful possession of the mountain. Then Goff made the Balls believe that they were due a big share of the proceeds of the Moreland coal! It wasn't very hard to do, I guess. The Balls, this set, at least, were originally lowlanders; they took to the mountains, I understand, to keep from being forced to fight during the Civil war."

"Goff's idea," muttered Dale, "is to get the Balls to scare me into selling instead of developing, eh?"

"Exactly," nodded old Bradley. "Then he would settle with the Balls by giving them a dollar or two a day for digging coal; perhaps he would put them off until the mine was worked out for half of that, and then skip. Anyway, Goff would come out at the big end."

"I see," said Dale.

"If there's anything that I can do, at any time, you won't hesitate to let me know?" said the major.

"You may consider yourself attorney and legal adviser for the Moreland Coal company, of which I have the honor to be general manager," smiled Dale, "if you will."

Major Bradley's voice came happily. "My dear boy, I am glad to accept! And there shall be no charge for any service that I may render."

They were not long in reaching the green valley, which lay very beautiful and very peaceful in the warm light of the early July sun. The soft murmuring of the crystal river and the low, slow tinkling of the cowbells made music that was sweet and pleasing.

Suddenly John Moreland stopped, uttered a swearword under his breath, turned and went back to Dale.

"The's a man a-waitin' on us ahead thar, Bill," he drawled, "'at ye shore want to watch like a hawk to keep him from a-stealin' the eyeteeth out o' yore head. His name is Henderson Goff, and he wants coal."

They went on. Soon they met a man who, in clothing and manner, made Dale think of stories he had heard and read of Mississippi river steamboat gamblers of the long ago. His eyes were black, and as keen as a pair of spear-points; his mustaches, too, were black, and they had sharp, upturned ends like those of a Mephisto. The major had said that he was a smooth article; he certainly looked it.

He met John Moreland with an oily smile and thrust out his hand. But Moreland wouldn't see the hand.

"Anything ye've got to say about coal," he growled, "ye can say to Bill Dale thar," pointing with a calloused thumb. "Bill he's the high light o' the whole business; and when he opens his mouth, ye can cock yore head to one side and listen fo' gawspel."

Goff was delighted to meet Mr. Dale, of whom he had already heard. Dale had nothing whatever to say. They walked on toward the cabin of the Moreland chief, with Goff keeping up a running fire of talk concerning the scenery, the climate—anything but coal.

At John Moreland's gate, Goff nudged Dale with an elbow and whispered:

"Meet me at one o'clock down there where the big sycamore lies across the river. I've got something to tell you that will interest you."

He didn't wait for a reply, but turned away with By Heck. He went to the home of the Hecks ostensibly to have his fortune told—really, to get his dinner. The old woman didn't like him, but her inborn spirit of hospitality wouldn't permit her to refuse him a meal. She felt that she was almost even with him when, after shuffling and reading the cards, she told him that it would be wise for him to look out for a big, tall, grey-eyed young man with an oak tree in one hand and a couple of cliffs in the other.

* * * * * * * *

Dale told Major Bradley and John Moreland of that which Goff had said to him at the gate. The major suggested forthwith that he go to meet the man; it couldn't possibly do any harm, and there was a chance that he would learn something of Goff's intentions.

So Dale went.

Goff was already there, waiting. He was sitting on a stone on the Moreland side of the river, whittling idly. When he saw Dale approaching, he smiled and nodded, rose and pocketed his knife.

"I want to make you an offer for that coal," he said at once.

"All right," Dale replied. "If your offer is big enough, it will be considered. But no shyster price is going to get that coal, Goff."

Goff frowned uneasily.

"You don't know coal, Mr. Dale. You don't know the business of mining—or I've got you sized up wrong. Thousands of men have gone busted trying to do things they weren't used to doing. There's a big chance, too, that the coal isn't what it looks to be on the surface. You'd better take a sure thing, and avoid a possibility of loss. I'll give you five thousand, spot cash, for that coal."

Dale shook his head. "You'll have to come heavier than that, y'know, if you get the Moreland coal."

"And an extra thousand for yourself!"

Dale laughed a low, queer laugh. "You amuse me, Goff," said he. "Seems to me you've missed your calling in life. What a peach of a king-villain you'd make in melodrama! You wouldn't have to act, either; you'd have to be just your natural self. And you make me mad, too, Goff. Because I'm on the square with the Morelands and everybody else—now, get that!"

The corners of the shyster coal man's mouth came down.

"Oh, bosh—don't pass me that virtue stuff. Every man has his price, high or low. You've got yours, and I've got mine. I'll give you five thousand, spot cash, if you'll persuade John Moreland to sell to me for five thousand, and nobody'll ever know you got a rakedown from me. It's all the coal is worth, that ten thousand. Well, yes?"

Dale was of the type that goes pale with anger, and he was pale now. He clenched his hands.

"You can't insult me like that and get away with it, Goff," he clipped. "We're going to fight, Goff, and I'm going to put a licking on you that fifteen horses can't pull off. Get me?"

He threw aside his coat and rolled his sleeves to his elbows. Henderson Goff ran his right hand quickly to a rear trouser pocket and brought back a stub-nosed automatic pistol, which he turned threateningly toward Bill Dale.

"Go easy, friend," Goff said very complacently. "There's no use in getting sore. I want the coal, that's all. If I can't get it by fair means, I'll get it in another way. Oh, I don't mind telling you; one man's oath is as good in court as another man's. If you don't take me up at ten thousand, I'll give you so much trouble that you'll be glad to sell it to me later for half that amount. The Balls think they own a big interest in that coal! There's a lot of them, too, and they can keep you from working the mine. Well, I can't waste time in dickering with you. What do you say?"

"I say," and Dale smiled an odd little smile, "that your plan appears to be perfect, except that you've overlooked one or two important details. For instance, there's the law, y'know."

"The law—now don't go and fool yourself!" exclaimed Goff. "The state couldn't afford to keep a hundred men here, month in and month out, just to protect your little mine. My patience is about gone, Dale—for the last time, what do you say?"

"I say that I'll beat you at any game you put up against me," very quietly. "Furthermore, I say that you are a coward and a scoundrel, and that you haven't got the insides in you to fight me a fair man's fight. If you'll only pocket that thing you've got in your hand, I'll mow down half an acre of meadow bush with your body."

The other turned red, then white, then red again. Bill Dale's words had lashed him keenly. His eyes became like hard black beads, and he began to raise the wicked-looking pistol as though he meant to fire.

Then there was the sound of a breaking twig behind him, and a voice drawled out:

"Drap it, Mister—drap the funny little gun, or the middle o' Tarment is yore po'tion right now!"

It was the moonshiner, By Heck, and his rifle was leveled. Goff dropped the pistol. Heck grinned, advanced slowly, took up the weapon that the hillfolk call a "coward's gun" and tossed it into the river.

"Now git—cut the mustard—light a rag away from here," he ordered, "afore I let Bill Dale loose on ye!"

Goff went away rapidly.

"I wonder if you heard him say anything that would make you valuable as a witness," muttered Dale, "in the event we want to have him arrested?"

"I heerd you tell him 'at he was afeard to fight ye a fair man's fight, and 'at ef he'd pocket that thing he held in his hand ye'd mow down twenty acres o' meadow bush with his low-down body—that'd be vallyable in co'te wouldn't it?"

Dale smiled. Then he frowned.

CHAPTER IX.

A Signal Victory.

The mining man Hayes, the major and John Moreland were waiting at the gate when Dale, accompanied by the moonshiner, returned to the cabin. Dale was the first to speak. He told briefly of that which had taken place at the blown-down sycamore, and at the last of it By Heck straightened proudly.

"I be dadjimmed ef I hadn't ha' pumped him so full o' lead 'at the' couldn't enough o' men got around him to tote off his corpst, ef he hadn't ha' drapped the coward's gun," By Heck declared as fiercely as he could. "'Cause maw she seed in the cup 'at Bill Dale was a-goin' to be a right pa'tickler friend o' mine, Igod, and I has a habit o' takin' keer o' my friends. Now thar was my Uncle Bill, him what could jump a sixteen-rail fence——"

"It was a nine-rail fence, By," impatiently cut in John Moreland. "You've done told that so much 'at it's dang nigh wore out. S'posen ye go back thar to the orchard ahind o' the house and see what Cale and Luke's a-doin'; hey, By?"

Heck nodded and went toward the orchard. He knew they didn't want him to overhear what they were going to say, but it didn't offend him. It wasn't easy to offend the good-natured Heck.

Moreland turned to Dale. "Well?"

Dale turned to Hayes.

"We're going to begin the building of the little railroad at the earliest possible moment. And because I don't know anything about the work, I'm going to ask you to take the lead. Now, there may be some fighting. I don't want you to go into this thing blindly, you see. If you're going to withdraw at all, do it now."

"I'm not a stranger to fighting," Hayes replied smilingly. "I've been through half a dozen coal strikes. I think you may count on me, Mr. Dale."

"Then lay out a plan for immediate action."

"I'd suggest," acquiesced Hayes, "that we send to the little town in the lowland for a supply of picks and shovels, axes and saws, hammers, drills, and explosives. In the meantime, you and I can stake out the way for the track."

It sounded businesslike, Dale thought.

Within the hour John Moreland and his son Caleb started for Cartersville on foot, and in the older man's pocket was money sufficient to buy the things that were needed.

Dale and Hayes set out for the north end of David Moreland's mountain, and each of them carried a hand-ax for making stakes.

It was not often that the quiet Hayes permitted himself to go into raptures over anything; however, he went into raptures over the Moreland coal. It was, he declared, one of the best propositions he had ever seen. It was no wonder that Henderson Goff was determined to get possession of it, he said.

Then they went to work.

By sundown two days later they had chosen the route for the narrow-gauge railroad and set stakes accordingly. Hayes told his general manager that with a good force of men the last rail could be put down within two months.

During those two days they had several times seen Henderson Goff in company with Black Adam Ball and some of his relatives. Once they had come upon Goff talking earnestly with Saul Littleford, the big, bearded, gaunt brother of the Littleford chief. Hayes reminded Dale of this, and said to him further:

"Goff will have the Littlefords on his side the first thing you know! Maybe some of the Littlefords, as well as some of the Balls, knew about this coal before David Moreland got his mountain by state's grant at a few cents per acre. If you'll take my advice, Mr. Dale, you'll make friends of these two sets just as quick as you can."

Dale thrust his hand-ax inside his belt and turned to the mining expert.

"D'you know, I was thinking of that same thing when you spoke," he replied. "And I believe I can manage it, now that Miss Littleford's accidental wounding has given the old feud such a big blow. I'm fairly sure I can manage it so far as Ben Littleford is concerned; it's John that's going to be hard to bring to taw. He should be home this evening, if he's had good luck, and I'll tackle him as soon as he comes."

Together they started across David Moreland's mountain, walking rapidly, with Dale leading.

Darkness came down on them when they had covered half the distance. The great hemlocks and poplars loomed spectral and gaunt in the early starlight. The almost impenetrable thickets of laurel and ivy whispered uncanny things, and their seas of pink and snowy bloom looked somehow ghostly. Now and then there was the pattering of some little animal's feet on the dry, hard leaves of bygone years. A solitary brown owl poured out its heart in weird and melancholy cries to the night it loved. There was the faint, far-off baying of a hound, and the soft swish of a night hawk's wings.

Men from the core of civilization must feel these things of the wilderness. . . .

Suddenly Dale drew back and stood still. In the trail ahead, standing as motionless as the trees about him, was the tall figure of a man. It was almost as though he were there to bar the way.

The two went on slowly. The figure didn't move. Dale spoke, and the form came to life. It was By Heck; he was leaning on the muzzle of his rifle.

"It's you, is it, Bill, old boy?" He yawned sluggishly. "I was a-waitin' here fo' you. I reckon I must ha' went to sleep a-standin' here on my feet! I've got news, Bill."

"Out with it."

"I've been a-trailin' Henderson Goff all day," Heck said in guarded tones. "He's shore got them lowdown Balls to believin' they're already millionhairs."

"I knew that," said Dale. "That's not news."

"But that ain't all," By Heck went on. "Goff's got Saul Littleford, too—lock, stock, bar'l and sights. He owns Saul jest the same as I own my old spotted 'coon dawg Dime. Saul he gits him a job a-bein' mine boss, and what other Littlefords 'at will stick gits jobs a-diggin' the black di'mont at two dollars a day. Asides, all of 'em is to have a big lot o' money when the dividin'-up time comes, says Goff."

"Much obliged to you, By," Dale acknowledged. "Let's go; 'bout face, By! I'm goin' to tie a hard knot in that villainous game of Henderson Goff's."

They reached John Moreland's cabin less than an hour later. Moreland and his son had just returned from Cartersville, and Dale learned through Hayes that the two hillmen had shown good judgment and some business sense in making their purchases.

When the evening meal was over Dale drew John Moreland out to the cabin yard, where the many old-fashioned flowers made the night air sweet with their blended odors. For a moment Dale stood looking toward the very bright stars and thinking; then he told the big man at his side of Goff's plan concerning the Littlefords, and strongly urged the making of friendship between the two clans.

"The snake!" mumbled John Moreland.

He appeared to be worried about it. He folded his arms, walked to the gate and back to Dale without uttering another word. It was hard for him to throw down completely the hatred of years upon years. Had it been any other person than Bill Dale, a fighter after his own heart, who had asked it, he never would have even considered it; he would have said quickly:

"We'll thrash the Balls and the Littlefords, too!"

The younger man read something of the other's thoughts.

"With the help of the law," said he, "we might whip them all. But it would mean a great deal of bloodshed at best. The Littlefords are Babe's people, y'know. I like Babe. You like her, too, or you never would have gone with her to the hospital—now don't you?"

"The Snake!" Mumbled John Moreland.

"I reckon I cain't deny," the Moreland leader muttered, "'at I like Babe Littleford. She ain't like none o' the rest of 'em, Bill."

Dale went on:

"All there is to do to enlist the Littlefords on our side is this: you go to old Ben and say to him: 'Let's begin anew; let's be friends, your people and my people, you and me.' He'll be glad you did it. Then it will be easy sailing for us. The Balls never would dare to attack such a force as the Morelands and the Littlefords combined. Don't you see? I admit it will be something of a sacrifice on your part. But a man like you can make sacrifices. Any man who is big enough to go down on his knees and ask the blessing of the Almighty on his enemies is big enough to make sacrifice. Come—let's go over and see Ben Littleford now; won't you?"

AIN'T THAT SO?

Exchange: Once upon a t'me I thought I knew men and could marry any one of them with one hand and my eyes shut But, alas, it frightens me to discover, if you permit one to make love to you he gets tired of you in the years to come; and if you don't he get offended in the beginning.

If you agree with him in everything you soon cease to interest him; and if you don't agree with him in everthing, you soon cease to charm him.

If you don't believe everthing he tells you, he thinks you are a cyn'c; and if you do, he thinks you are a fool.

If you wear gay colors, rouge and startling hats, he hesitates to take you out; and if you wear a little tam and a tailored suit, he takes you out and gazes all evening at some women in gay colors.

If you are jealous of him, he can't endure you; if you are not, he can't understand you. If you join in his gayety, and approve of his smoking, he vows you are leading him to the devil; and if you disapprove of his gayety and urge him to give up smoking, he swears you are driving him to the devil. If you are affectionate, he soon tires of your kisses and seeks consolation in some other woman.

If you are sweet, old fashioned, clinging, he doubts if you have any brains, and if you are modern, advanced and independent he doubts that you have a heart or scruples.

If you are cute and boyish, he longs for a soul mate; if you are brilliant and intellectual, he longs for a playmate; if you are temperamental and poetic, he longs for a helpmate.

And all the time he is falling in love with you, he is trying to remodel you into what you are not, never were, and never will be. Isn't this true?

It isn't always true that the right hand knows not what the left hand does. It frequently occurs that each knows the other does nothing.

WHEN A FORD MEETS A SKUNK, WHAT'S THE ANSWER?

If you run over a skunk with your car what would you do? Lew Clake suggests burying the skunk.

Tad Lamos says bury the car.

While returning from Clarion Tuesday evening an Eagle Grove car nad a skunk to deal with.

They said the skunk suddenly appeared ahead of the car and evidenced no desire to get out of the way. It was held by one of the wise men in the car that if you do not anger a skunk, he will not molest you.

And Matt Armbruster, on be'ng interviewed, said, "It would make any skunk mad to be run over by a Ford."

George Winter and his Ford were just a few rods in the rear, so it was decided to rush over the skunk, hoping to knock him far enough out of the way that by the time he got reorganized, they would be out of range and George right in the l'ne of fire.

It worked ont just the opposite. The barrage caught the offending car, but Mr. Winter and his passengers came through the danger zone without molestation.

In the meantime there is a Ford sedan that will not circulate in pol'te society for a few days.—Eagle.

Clarence Slining of this place was somewhat badly injured in an auto wreck Monday night. Together with George Blau of Alexander and the Misses Avis and Norva Wilson of Goodell were coming from a Sunday scohol picnic. A car ahead of them stopped to pick up a couple of girls, and the boys endeavored to turn out to pass. The front of the car missed but the back struck the other car, causing the Blau car to turn over six times.

Belmond Township Farmers Donate Labor For Roads

Meet With Township Officials And Make Proposition To Gravel Roads

TO GRAVEL TWO MILES

One of the best co-operative efforts that has come to the notice of the public for some time is that which was recently staged by the farmers in Belmond township, when, in co-operation with the trustees of the township, an agreement was made by some 12 or so of the farmers in that vicinity to donate their labor in gravelig a two-mile stretch of road.

The farmers agree to donate their labor in hauling the gravel and in spreading it on the road, the gravel to be furnished and loaded by the township. The stretch of road to be graveled is the mile north from the Hardwick place, and the first mile west from the corner.

The north and south mile will be graveled first, and the work is to begin as soon as the corn is out. The gravel will be taken from the Highberger pit north of town, where the township will load it on the wagons.

It is estimated that to gravel the two miles will require in the close neighborhood of twelve hundred odd loads, making the average which each farmer agrees to haul free about one hundred. Hauling one hundred loads of gravel free is some donation for anyone to make, and Belmond township is certainly to be congratulated upon having such a bunch of enterprising and public spirited citizens. The men figure that it is cheaper for them to donate their time and labor than to eventually have it done by the township or county and the costs taxed up to them.

CITY SCHOOLS OF COUNTY TAKES LARGE SUM

From Miss Bock's annual report to the state superintendent of public instruction is gleaned some interesting information regarding the expense of operating the several town schools of the county. Clarion leads all others in the low cost of tuition to its pupils with the exception of the Woolstock school, which would hardly be considered in the same class. The average cost of tuition per month for each pupil is as follows:

Clarion $6.09; Belmond $6.56; Eagle Grove $7.80; Goldfield $8.52; Galt $10.11; Rowan $6.10; Dows $7.43; Woolstock $3.00.

The total expense of operating these same schools is a tidy sum as shown below. The first column is the amount paid teachers and the second includes all other expense in connection with the school.

Belmond	$27,683.25	*10,780.83
Clarion	35,042	14,077.62
Dows	19,736.16	5,802.24
Eagle Grove	48,877.41	*50,306.02
Galt	3,825.00	880.37

Woolstock	5,355.00	1,494.44
Totals	$168,856.39	$98,011.77

EPWORTH LEAGUE RALLY A SUCCESS

The Epworth League sub-district rally held in Belmond last Sunday marks another triumph for the young people of the Epworth League of Belmond. The program was carried out as planned and the afternoon session, under the leadership of Mrs. J. S. White, was one of inspiration. Miss Bernetas Wolle, local first vice-president, imbibed some of the Institute "pep" she recieved at Lake Okoboji last July, into the meeting and the visiting Leagues entered into the spirit of the meeting in a regular Institute way. The local League female quartette belighted the audience with their splendid singing and when it came time to adjourn for Franklin Grove for supper we were just one happy bunch. After a delicious supper served cafeteria style the crowd gathered around a huge camp fire and under the leadership of Miss Doris Bailey played games and sang Epworth League songs.

Miss Bock the County Superintendent of schools led the evening devotionals. She was ably assisted by Clarion young people. They brought out many good thoughts and used for their topic the regular Epworth League topic, "They Will be Done With My Time."

INFANTILE PARALYSIS CASE FATAL AT HOLMES

A fatal case of infantile paralysis occured at Holmes last week. Gerhart, the fourteen year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Amdahl, was taken sick Sunday and passed away Thursday night. The boy was buried Friday, sympathetic neighbors standing outside while Rev. Spande, pastor of the Norwegian church of Eagle Grove conducted the services.

Gerhart is mourned by his parents, two brothers and two sisters, whose sorrow is keenly felt by their friends and neighbors.

There is a lighter case of infantile paralysis in the Morris Fraser family one-half mile south of Holmes and the home is quarantined.—Monitor.

Farm Bureau Social Held At Geo. Potts Home

Social Gathering Enjoyed By Farmers At Potts Home On Friday Afternoon

CULLING DEMONSTRATION

The Geo. W. Potts home five miles west of Belmond was the scene of a community social and a poultry culling demonstration on Friday afternoon of last week.

The meeting was planned originally for a social of the ladies of the community and was arranged to include a poultry culling demonstration.

The county agent was present and talked for about an hour and gave an actual demonstration of the culling operation. The hens which were used in the demonstration were furnished by several of the neighbors. The demonstration was followed by refreshments being served by the good housewives of the community.

COUNTRY CLUB ELECTS NEW OFFICERS

The Clarmond Country Club held its annual business meeting at the clubhouse Tuesday evening, and elected John L. Lundblad, president; Wm. Tyrrell, of Belmond, vice president; Geo. W. Young, Jr., secretary; Hal Smith, treasurer; and Messrs M. F. Birdsall, Dr. W. S. Steele, Mr. Klemme, of Belmond, and Dr. St. Clair, of Clarion, directors.

The club has decided to close its membership list shortly, and the members have been given to understand that if they have any friends who wish to join, now is the time. There is room for about thirty additional members to complete the one hundred which is the club limit, and when these have been secured, no more will be taken except as a member sells his membership and drops out. Financially the club is in good shape, the property easily being worth every cent that has been paid for memberships. Plans are under way to make it a social center at which different social activities will be promoted, and it is the belief that within a year or two the most of the club memberships will be selling at a premium. Several winter parties are being planned, including dances, one a masquerade and a big Hallowe'en party.

FARM HOME DESTROYED BY FIRE MONDAY

The A. A. Johnson home at the edge of East Lake near Kanawha was destroyed by fire on Monday of this week, the house and barn, and all the adjacent buildings being consumed by the flames. The family were engaged in butchering, and it is thought that the leaves caught fire, for the whole place seemed to be afire before they realized it. The stock was saved, but the buildings and most of the things in them are a total loss. It is not known whether Mr. Johnson carried insurance on the buildings destroyed or not.

COMMUNITY CLUB FOOD SALE CLEARS $40

The food sale of the Community Welfare club held last Saturday afternoon in the library basement, was a splendid success from every standpoint and resulted in the ladies of the club clearing something glike forty dollars. The sale was very well attended and the foodstuffs on sale were disposed of as soon as they were labeled and placed on the tables. The good cooks of the city evidently have a far-reaching reputation, for their products at the sale Saturday were snapped up in such short order that at four o'clock there was little or nothing left.

DISTRICT COURT NEWS

News: The outstanding feature of district court is the rumor that John Berg, Belmond banker, will not stage a legal battle for freedom from the indictments hanging over him, but will plead guilty and throw himself upon the mercy of the court. It was understood that he was to enter his plea Tuesday afternoon (last week) and he was here with friends, but returned to Belmond without making a plea. It is rumored that in the event he does plead guilty without a trial, he will receive a sentence and any move toward a parole will come only after he has been incarcerated.

The grand jury is in session, with T. A. Davenport of Belmond as foreman, and fellow members are John Soren, Ole Melhus, Clarion; R. H. Lester, Goldfield; F. M. Meyers, Rowan; A. N. Rolfe, Eagle Grove; O. G. Christianson, Kanawha; J. C. Brown, Clarion, clerk.

Peter Nelson of Dows, indicted for illegal manufacture of booze, entered a plea of guilty and was fined $200 by the court.

The case of the state against N. H. Murphy, who was alleged to have disposed of mortgaged property, was dismissed, Murphy having made a settlement with the complaining witness, E. G. Gould, who also dismissed a civil suit against Murphy.

The real business of the present term is yet to come, only the default cases having been handled up to adjournment Wednesday afternoon. The following judgements were entered against defendants in this manner.

In Severe & Sams' suit for possession of a boar pig against J. G. Freese attachment proceedings pending, defendant defaulted and costs were aginst him. Mr. Freese bought the boar but the sellers reserved show rights and had to go to court to get possession of the pig when the time came to show him as provided in the original sale agreement.

In the John Brooks Hogan vs. Thomas Brooks et al suit for possession of Cornelia land or its equivalent in cash, defendants were given until Monday to plead.

Ross & Harris vs. R. G. Shaver, judgement for $1,437.50 and interest and costs.

GOV'T. TESTER EXAMINED THE LOCAL HERDS

Total Of Three Hundred Head Are Tested For Tuberculosis By Expert

SEVERAL HERDS DISEASED

Total Of Twenty-nine Cows Found Tubercular Are From Eight Herds

A number of the herds of dairy cattle in this vicinity have been tested the past week or two for tuberculosis, and the results have been more than surprising in some case.

One farmer is reported to have had ten cows in his herd condemned as being tubercular, while another had four who reacted to the test. Several different men had one and two cows in their herds which were found to be infected with the deadly tuberculosis.

When an animal is condemned, it is killed, the owner being reimbursed by the state and government for practically the value of the animal. The herd of Mike Luick, numbering some thirty-seven in number, were found to be O. K., as were the herds of several other farmers.

The only trouble with this testing seems to be that it is not compulsory; the owner of a cow can have the animal tested or not, as he desires, and some of them appear to be afraid that they might lose a cow if they had the test made. Regardless of the fact that they may contract tuberculosis if they don't.

After a herd has been tested, the owner is not permitted to buy or sell any animals for a certain length of time afterwards. No cream or milk can be sold for a week after the test if any animal is found to be diseased in the herd.

COMMUNITY CLUB HOLDS FINE MEETING

The Community Welfare club held their regular monthly meeting at the limbrary basement September 30. Over 80 were present. The business meeting of the club voted to take charge of the tubercular seal campaign in November.

Mrs. Schultz introduced Mrs. Max Mayer of Iowa City who gave an interesting lecture on Child Welfare.

Refreshments were served by the committee in charge, Mrs. W. Tyrrell, Mrs. Flynn, Mrs. Hildebrand, Mrs. Tiara, Mrs. Frank Barry, Mrs. Mitte Anderson, Mrs. Mike Luick, Jr., Mrs. Preston, Mrs. O. Jenison, Mrs. C. P. Luick, Mrs. Thiltgen.

In the evening Mrs. Mayer lectured on the "Good American." Carol Tyrrel played an instrumental solo and those present sang America.

Mrs. Earl Martin will have charge of the next meeting, the subject of which will be dress forms.

MRS. EDGE GIVEN FAREWELL PARTY BY AID

The ladies of the Ladies Aid society of the M. E. church gave Mrs. J. H. Edge a farewell party at the home of Mrs. F. E. Snyder on Monday afternoon of this week. Mrs. Edge and her husband have been assigned to the charge at Spirit Lake for this coming year. About 35 guests were present at the party, refreshments being served. As a token of their esteem and friendship, the ladies presented Mrs. Edge with a silver meat fork.

"Lefty" Ray began his new duties the first of the week at the Case Hotel, as clerk.

JOHN BERG ENTERS PLEA OF GUILTY

Belmond's defaulting cashier, John Berg, entered a plea of guilty to the charge of larceny Monday afternoon. Judge McCall fixed Tuesday next, October 18, at 1:30 p. m. as time for pronouncing sentence. Bail bond is to remain in full force until that time. By agreement with County Attorney Rogers, the second indictment on the same charge against the defendant has been dismissed. It has been known for some time that friends of the accused had been laboring with him to bring about the above plea.—Monitor.

A reception for Rev. Wilkinson, the new pastor of the Methodist church here, will be held on Friday evening at the church, the reception to take place at seven thirty. All are invited to attend, meet the new minister and his family, and bid them welcome to their new home.

Mr. and Mrs. Chris Sorenson drove to Minnesota last Saturday to their son Harry, and when they returned Monday morning of this week they brought back ten bushels of the finest potatoes that the writer has ever had the pleasure of eating. We acknowledge a gift of some of them, and we are here to say that they certainly are "some spuds."

40 AND 8 TO MEET IN HAMPTON OCT. 7TH.

The local members of the "40 and 8," auxiliary of the American Legion have practically completed their plans for the big festivities on October 7th when they will initiate a big class of legionaires into the auxiliary. The main feature of the day will be the parade at 2:30 in the afternoon.

It is probable that some of the candidates will do a few amusing stunts on the streets, but the initiation proper will take place at the high school building. All candidates are requested to meet at the Memorial hall promptly at 1:00 o'clock. Any member of the American Legion is eligible for membership in "Le Societe Des Hommes 40 et 8 Chevaux."

A football game between Hampton and Britt will be an added attraction on the program.—Chronicle.

THIEVES BROKE IN TO STEAL

Garner Leader: About 1:30 o'clock Thursday night last Night Police John MacNichol, noticed a light in the Larson Meat Market. This was entirely unusual and he investigated. He found that a couple of fellows were prowling about the place, using a flashlight for illumination. Mr. MacNichol, thinking perhaps it was Oscar Larson or some of his help, tried the front door and while he was in the alley, the would-be robbers made their get-away out the front door. John called Mr. Larson and when they arrived at the market, the front door was wide open. The crooks beat out of town in an easterly direction, leastwise there was a car traveling at top speed in that direction when Mr. MacNichol and Mr. Larson arrived at the market. It has been the custom of the place to leave what change there was on hand in a certain place in the market and judging from the way the fellows were searching, they had a good idea of the general location of "Scoops' hiding place. Due to the watchfulness of Marshall John, the Larson Market suffered no loss.

SANITY AND SURFACED ROADS

Grundy County Dispatch: Grundy county has started to gravel its high ways and is now on the way to surfaced roads. Gravel is the only solution for the mudhole that can be applied by the farmer. It is serviceable, economical and sane. Advices from Tama county indicate that county has abandoned most of its ideas for pavement and is now considering gravel. There has been some agitation for a paved road between Toledo and Traer but the cost of the project has turned the thoughts of many to gravel.

Hardin county faced the two possibilities during the war and after a fight decided in favor of gravel for surfacing and now that county has many miles of it which is proving satisfactory. The pavement idea was a product of the boom times a few years past when money was as loose as it was plenitul. Pavement was an hallucination of this abnormal state of affairs and those with foresight visualized at once the burden it would put on the shoulders of the rising generation, if it would not also be a heritage of those yet unborn.

Under present conditions, pavement will not give a return commensurate for its cost and there is no reason to believe that the rural communities will be in position to use it advantageously for several decades at least. Gravel is the means at hand for the needs of the day, and where is has been applied and used it has stood the test and met the requirements. Around the lakes in the northwestern section of the state such roads stretch for miles and are the pride of the countryside. Along the Lincoln highway thru the counties of Greene, Boone and Story, there are miles more of this kind of highway that roll in a long even plane.

Where the roadbed has been graded before it is surfaced, rain may fall for hours without eroding it. There are no mudholes because there is neither the mud nor the holes. Where the county has pits at its disposal the cost is less sthan a dollar an acre in assessments and six or seven miles can be surfaced with gravel where one can be constructed by cement. The cost of upkeep is negligible and the farmer or the townsman has a road that is a match for the worst season.

The Independent thoroly endorses the sentiments expressed in the foregoing as to graveled roads. It is the opinion of his paper that gravel is the only logical solution to our road problem. Were it put to a vote, there is little doubt but what the majority of motorists would favor riding on a good gravel road. The tires get a firmer grip, there is not the danger of skidding, there is more variation to the riding, and a good graveled road is always in good shape, regardless of the amount of rain that may fall on it. If a road is properly graveled nothing short of a cloudburst will spoil it.

The stretch of graveled road east of Belmond, past the Emanuel church, is, the Independent is willing to bet, the finest example of graveled road in Wright county. Level as a floor, without a dip or a bump in it, garded to perfection, this road is the delight of every motorist who has traveled over it. Roads like this are the kind that we need. They will stand the traffic, will be in good shape after any rain, and they cost but a fraction of the paved road.

This is no time to add additional financial burdens to the farmer. He has about all he can stagger along under right now without having an assessment of several thousand dollars piled upon him for paved roads. The average farmer will vote for graveled roads, but he will not vote for paving, and can you blame him? If the money that is spent on one stretch of paved road, were expended on a system of graveling, three times the miles of roads could be put into shape for the same amount of money.

CLIPPINGS

Berns Missman made the trip to Belmond all alone Saturday where he went to visit his grandparents, Dr. and Mrs. Missman drove down Sunday and brought him home.—Klemme Times.

The wrestling match held at the theatre last week Wednesday night was the best match ever seen for a long time. The main event was the match between Martin Jensen and Hans Willer, both of Klemme. Jensen won both falls, the first in about 24 minutes and the second in fifty-seven minutes. The time shows that the mateh was good. Both men were clever and gave a good exhibition. Jensen stated that this was his last match and will not appear again to wrestle anyone. Willer therefore holds the championship of the county.—Klemme Times.

Some of the younger children of Clarion who have a liking for African golf had their little game rudely interrupted this afternoon when Dan Leanord sneaked up behind them and captured the boys as well as their boes. Dan learned they had bought them on the installment plan from a youthful friend after they had learned they couldn't buy them at a drugstore.—News.

IS IT YOU? WAKE UP!

Where is that man in your town who is so wrapped up in self as to have forgotten the dear little lady eighty years young, who toiled for you in childhood days, who cared for you when suffering, who comforted you when childish troubles seemed mountains, who wiped your tears away, clothed you from her own scant earnings and with her own hands sewed and fashioned your garments, exerting herself to the utmost for your rearing that you should grow to be a good man.

Spared herself no pains for your comfort and stinting herself that you might have enough. Now that you have a home and plenty, your family, comfort and happiness, your car for joy rides, your business ability to progress and prosper I want to ask you, oh man, why have you forgotten this dear old grandmother?

She stays at home alone, doing her own garden work, caring for her household necessities with a smile on her face, but oh such a longing for just a letter from you man, just a boy grown old, for you are her boy still, to her loving heart and you are only a boy still or you would never be so careless of this dear one.

I said to her, "It seems as if he surely would write to you once a month, grandma." "Oh I'd be satisfied if he would write once in two months," said the little lady with a chuckle, "he promised to write me but no letter ever comes."

What a little thing to ask but it means so much to her. Boy, wake up. You don't know how few letters you may be able to write if you wait much longer. The joy one letter would bring means a new lease on life because someone she loves appreciates; joy because her boy has written it, thinks of her and wants to give happiness in gratitude for the love and care she has bestowed on him all these years. Wake up, man, don't delay another moment.

If you can't write send her the home town paper.

No, keeping everlastingly at it does not necessarily bring success. It enables a person to go out and achieve it.

No Subsitute Offered.

Celebrate Their Golden Wedding Anniversary

Mr. And Mrs. B. Frey Observe The Fittieth Year Of Their Life Together

MANY OF FAMILY PRESENT

The 22nd day of October was a happy day for Mr. and Mrs. B. Frey of Meservey, Ia., when surrounded by their children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, relatives and friends, they celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding.

It was a beautiful day, the weather adding to the happiness of the occasion.

A short service was held at the Reformed church at 10:30 a. m. The Rev. H. Pannkuk, pastor of the Reformed church, officiated. He chose for his text Psalm 126.3: "The Lord hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad." The pastor spoke of God's mercies toward them in the past and of their trust in Him for the future. A few musical numbers were given by two of the grandchildren, the Misses Geitz and Grace Johanna Pals. A gift of seventy-five dollars in gold was presented to the celebrating couple by the children and their families. The invited friends also presented them with a token of love either in money or otherwise.

After the services the guests were invited to a bountiful dinner which had been prepared in the basement of the church.

It was a glad day. The impression made upon old and young will not easily be forgotten.

Mr. an Mrs. B. Frey were born, raised and married in Germany and came to America about 30 years ago. They settled in Meservey where they have resided ever since their arrival.

Mr. and Mrs. Frey lost one child of eight children by death a few years ago. Seven children, four daughters: Mrs. T. Lieuwen, Mrs. John P. Pals, Mrs. Harm J. Groen, Mrs. H. Suntken; three sons: Joe of Lyon Co., Ia., Bert and Henry of Meservey; 52 grandchildren, and 8 greatgrandchildren rejoice with their parents in God's goodness. In a material way the Lord has also blessed them.

Mr. Frey is seventy years of age and his wife is seventy-two. Both are enjoying good health. May the Lord bless them in the days which are still before them.

GARNER PAPER RUNNING GOODELL SECTION

The Garner Leader came to our desk this week with a two-page section devoted exclusively to the news and advertising of Goodell, and the Leader made an attractive feature out of it. The Goodell section is run as a part of the Leader, instead of as a sperate insert as the Independent carries the Meservey section. It will no doubt result in much additional circulation to the Leader as well as business and will place the Leader in a commanding position in that territory. The running of these sections for the smaller towns around is a move that we believe will be done more and more, for it furnishes the small town with newspaper representation.

See Heinie and have him order the Home News for you for a year at a cost of only one dollar.

The Message Bearers gave a good program on Sunday evening at the Evangelical church, and considering the short rehearsal that they had the program was exceptionally good. The offering amounted to the splendid sum of $19.28.

SCHOOL NOTES

School reopened again Monday. Some of the pupils are still husking but the majority are back on the work.

Prof. Klinker missed his train at Boone and did not arrive until Monday morning.

The school will have some fine note books to place upon display later, when we have Parents' day.

Basket ball games are being scheduled with Rowan, Sheffield, Ventura, Belmond and other schools.

Prof. and Mrs. Sifert autoed to Mason City, Saturday.

Supt. Neese and family, of Ventura were visitors at Meservey Sunday for a short time.

Prof. Macy Campbell, of Cedar Falls Normal College will speak at the school house auditorium Wednesday evening, October 26, tomorrow.

Supt. Newcomb and Mrs. Newcomb will be present tomorrow evening, Wednesday, October 26.

A flag raising was given Tuesday. It was a beautiful and inspiring program.

"Somebody tossed it
And somebody rolled it
Then they tossed it, and tossed it,
And rolled it and rolled it.
And it grew and it grew."
Until? Until it became?
Well? You know I promised not to tell. "So don't you tell."
"Oh, no! I never will."

Prof. E. A. Klinker had the misfortune to fall from or with a step ladder while aiding in the fixtures in the primary room. He had two bones broken iin his wrist. He is able to be about.

GOING UP!

An Englishman went to a baseball game and both sides made one run each in the first inning. The Englishman watched the scoreboard intently, as each team failed to make a run inning after inning. The game had gone sixteen innings and the figure one and the zeros following had left their impression on the mind of the Englishman. Going down the street after the game, a small boy stopped him and asked what the score was. "Oh," said the Englishman "I lost all track of the game; it's away up in the millions."

GOT EIGHT CENTS FOR HIDE AFTER HE PAID FREIGHT

Adair, Ia., Oct. 21—A. J. Leeper a farmer living south of town shipped a hide to Omaha market a few days ago thru a local gent.

When he called for his remittance at the agent's office he was handed four 2 cent stamps in full settlement.

An itemized statement showed that the hide weighed sixty pounds and brought 1 cent per pound or 60 cents; from this was deducted 52 cents for freight, leaving a balance of 8 cents due Mr. Leeper on this transaction.

The company paid him in 2-cent stamps.

Leeper is busy figuring just how many hides he would have to sell at this rate to buy a pair of shoes.

MESERVEY REGISTER HEAD TO BE CHANGED

Beginning with the issue of this week, the Meservey Register Section is changed to Meservey Section.

This is in accordance with orders from the United States Postal Department, which has advised that it is illegal to run the Meservey insert under the Register heading.

The publisher regrets very much that this must be done, for he wishes to give the people of Meservey a paper as near homelike as possible, but when Uncle Sam says No that ends it.

The Meservey Section will be exactly the same thing as the Register has been, except that the heading will be changed. We hope that the Meservey readers will accept the change in the manner that it is made, because it had to be done. We want you to consider the Meservey Section just as much your home paper as tho it was headed the Register, and we assure you that we will do our best to give you a home paper.

THE HOME NEWS ONE YEAR FOR $1.00

EDITORIAL

We have never been able to see any sense just why young men must go out and destroy property on Hallowe'en. Our tragedy of a few years ago has not been forgotten and it should be remembered that innocent persons are liable to be shot down like dogs.

Hallowe'en can be observed and a great deal of fun had without destroying property in the process. The fun derived in wrecking someone's chicken coop or in tipping over anything that comes handy is a fun that is difficult to see and that contains an element of personal risk and danger which should make the young man hesitate long and carefully before going into it.

That the innocent may suffer with the guilty has always been the case and was the case three years ago, when a tragedy occured that should never have been.

Plenty of fun can be had by the boys on Hallowe'en without the necessity of destroying somebody's property in the process. Property destruction under any circumstances is in excuseable, and Hallowe'en does not set aside a day or a time when the destruction is permissable any more than at any other.

Have your fun boys, but don't destroy some else's property in having it. The chances of your being hurt, innocently or otherwise, are too great to make it worth while.

Mr. and Mrs. Sloss and daughter of Ames visited at the home of their daughter Mrs. Frank Nissen and family Saturday and Sunday. Mr. Sloss has been with the state agricultural college fr the past 15 years and is now custodian of grounds and buildings. The college is much larger this most people imagine. It has 4500 students besides the disabled soldiers who are being sent there by the government. The grounds cover many acres.

COUNTRY EDITOR WRITES HEADLINES IN VERSE

Poetic license may in the future be one of the requirements for a successful newspaper writer or editor if the example of Will Wells editor of the Sisseton Weekly Courier finds favor with the profession.

Of all the state papers received by the state historical department, Well's sheet is in a class by itself. Its headlines are written in rhyme. A recent story telling of an escape from jail appeared under this headline:

THIS ROGUE BROKE JAIL
And Set Full Sail for Other Pastures New. But Langford's Mayor Took Up the Trail And Caught Him in a Slough.

Over the Couriers local news column appears the following:

THE HOME TOWN NEWS
And People's Views, Is Printed As It's Wrote, The Gentler Sex, the Men Folks Next and Other Things of Note.

There is a variety each week to the headings and always a tang of mystery which holds the reader to the story. One week when property ads were in the majority in the want ad columns this heading appeared:

DEALS IN DIRT
May Not Cause Mirth. They're Newsy Things To See A Lot or Farm, They Both Have Charm, To This You Will Agree.

RED CROSS MEETING

Last Tuesday Mr. and Mrs. O. P. Morton, Mrs. Alice Bann, Mrs. Weber and Mrs. Geo. Richards of Clarion met with the Rowan officers of the Red Cross at the bank. Wright county has hired an assistant to Miss Liddle the county nurse. The supervisors have appropriated a certain amount for this work and Clarion chapter with her auxiliaries assumed $800 of the expense $100 of which of the expense $100 of which is to be paid by the Rowan branch. There are over 1200 schools in the county and Miss Liddle could not handle the work alone, making it necessary to secure some help for her. It is felt that good may be done to a greater number of people thru the schools than any other way. Parents won't you co-operate with these nurses for the welfare of your children? All the nurses can do is to tell you the needs of your children and then it is "up to you."

A membership drive is planned for the weeks from Nov. 11 to 26th. It is the aim to get one member from each family. 50 cents of your dollar stays right in our treasury to help in this home welfare work and the other 50 cents goes to headquarters to help in the foreign fields. You can not estimate how much good your dollar will do. You may pay it at the bank if you wish.

Miss Liddle was in town Monday of this week in the interest of the Junior Red Cross. Scales are to to be purchased for the school on which the children may be weighed once a month thereby giving the nurses a chance to watch for any who are underweight and determining the cause. That is what these nurses are for, to find out if any of your children are under normal in any way and finding the reason why.. It may be some very small thing that has been overlooked by the parents and physician but may mean a life time of regret to the child if not taken care of at the proper time. Let us each one co-operate with these faithful workers and give the children of our county the best chance possible.

Mrs. Chris Jensen of Clarion spent Sunday at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Fred Welsh and family, returning Monday.

At the evening service last Sunday Miss Jean Kirvink and Rev. Tomkinson sang the duet "Whispering Hope" in a pleasing manner. Miss Ida Jourdan of the Shesler Home at Sioux City delivered a fine address on the social work of the Home Missionary society of the Methodist church. The Epworth League held a social half hour before the service which was enjoyed by those present.

Mrs. Walter Whitten's section of the Ladies Aid held a very successful chicken supper last Thursday, netting over $30. There was a splendid company of people present and all enjoyed the delightful social visit afterwards. Every group of the Aid society have done splendidly in these events.

Mrs. Earl Patton's mother and father, Mr. and Mrs. Kuns of Forest City attended the morning service at the Methodist church last Sunday. Mr. Miller of Hampton was present in the evening.

STEAL HERD OF HOGS

Thieves backed a wagon up to the pigpen of F. J. Thoman, of the Fairfax neighborhood, Cedar Rapids, and stole about a dozen hogs, according to the report made to Sheriff Thomas Avery by Mrs. Thoman.

Mr. Thoman is away from home and his wife does not know the exact number of hogs in the pen, but she thought a dozen. The pen was cleaned out. The sheriff has been unable to obtain a clew.

Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

GRAIN GROWERS START MEMBERSHIP DRIVE

Necessary legal steps have been taken and plans complete for launching an active membership campaign in Iowa in the interests of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., the new farmer-controlled cooperative grain marketing company, according to A. L.Middleton of Eagle Grove and Frank M. Myers of Fort Dodge, state directors in the organization. Mr. Middleton will have active management of the organization work as Mr. Myers, serving as secretary of the U. S. Grain Growers, spends most of his time in Chicago.

Plans as being formulated call for an intensive campaign in the surplus grain producing sections of Iowa during the fall and winter months. Several solicitors will be trained in the principles of the organization and sent into the field to sign contracts with co-operative elevators and with the growers. Where no co-operative elevator is located a local grain growers association will be formed.

Txelent progress has been made in organization work in the following states: North Dakota, Illinois, Nebraska, Missouri, Colorado, South Daketa, Kansas, Indiana and Oklahoma. Latest reports from national headquarters indicate that over 15,000 farmers affiliated with the movement. North Dakota stands in first place with 4,500 grower members, but the campaign has been in progress in the state for several months. Illinois is second with approximately 3,500 members and Nebraska third with 2,000. Missouri with 1,300 and Oklahoma with 1,400 are staging an interesting battle for fourth place.

Development of the farmers' finance corporation. a financial subsidiary of the U. S. Grain Growers and the consummation of permanent contracts with selling agencies will be held in obeyance until the first annual convention next March.

A Prouounced Success

The unform success that has attended the use of Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy in the relief and cure of bowel complaints, both children and adults, has brought it to almost universal use, so that it is prac tically without a rival and as everyone who has used it knows, it is without an equal.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

REASONS FOR GRAIN GROWERS DELAY

Reason for delay of organization work in Iowa by the U. S. Grain Grwers, Inc., farmer-owned coopera tive grain marketing company, was due to the fact that the statutes of the state have no provision for the operation of the national non-profit non-stock organization and in reality the U. S. Grain Growers was a new type of corporation for state officials to consider, according to A. L. Middleton of Eagle Grove, state diretor, who speedily is completing plans to launch an intensive mebership campaign among the ooperative elevators and grain growers of the state, with the assistance of the organization com mittee, representing the different farm organizations. State and national leaders of the U. S. Grain Growers have received friendly co-operation from Iowa officials in securing a permit to operate. Inidently, Iowa has the 19th state in which the U. S. Grain Growers has met all the repuirements to do business and practically completes the admissions contemplated in the heavy grain producing states of the middle west.

Two outstanding reasons for optimism at the start of the campaign in Iowa, Mr. Middletown pointed out, were the statment that more than 30,000,000 bushels of grain are now under contract in the nine states where organization work has been carried on and that membership has been constantly increasing for the last 30 days. Memberships are coming in at the rate of 299 a day. Approximately 20,000 farmers have accepted the growers contract to date. Illinois holds the lead with over 5,000 and North Dakota a close second with 4,500. Nebraska is approaching the 3,000 mark with Missouri and Oklaoma battling for fourth place with approximately 2,000 members.

Never in the history of the cooperative grain marketing movement have prospects for success been so bright as at the present, according to directors of the U. S. Grain Growers, who held their regular quarterly meeting at national headquarters recently. Much of the time during the three day session was devoted to a study of what has been accomplished since the corporation was organized in April and to laying plans for the immediate future.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

GRAPE KETCHUP—Something new in the line of ketchups which will provide a novelty to be added to the housewive's fruit shelves this winter is grape ketchup. The receipe is given as follows:

4 lbs. grapes, 2 T cinnamon, 1 T each of cloves and allspice, 1-4 t cayenne pepper (if desired) 1 cup vinegar, 1 t salt, 1 1-2 lbs. sugar. Wash and stem the grapes and steam them over water until soft. Put thru colander discarding only skins and seeds. To the portion which passes thru the sieve add spices sugar, salt and vinegar and let simmer for 15 minutes. Bottle and seal. Use whole spices tied in a cloth while cooking and remove before bottling . This will give a better color than ground spices. For making ketchup, grapes of the acid variety are preferred to very sweet ones.

ALSO GRAPE CONSERVE—Fine for winter use is this conserve made either with nuts and raisins or with oranges and raisins. Ingredients consist of 5 lbs. sugar, even lb. grapes, 1 lb. walnuts and 1 lb. raisins. Method: wash grapes, remove from stem, separate pulp and skins, and cook pulp after removing seeds by putting thru sieve. Chop skins raisins, walnuts. Mix with pulp and sugar. Cook until mixture thickens and put into glasses.

THIS ONE WITH ORANGES—This time use 6 lbs. grapes, 4 lb.s sugar, 2 lbs. raisins and 4 oranges (both juice and rind.) The method is exactly like that described above.

A DARN BY MACHINE SAVES TIME—Sheets towels, table linen and knit underwear may be darned by machine neatly and strong. Use 50 thread for towels and 100 for table linen. Tie up machine foot so that it is about 1-15 inch from the reed. This allows the work to be drawn forward and back. Stitch forward from 1-4 inch outside the hole across open area to within 1-4 inch of the outside of the hole on the other side. Continue until all the space is filled in with threads extending one way—called "warp" threads. In the same manner put in the cross or "woof" threads.

ARTISTIC PICTURE HANGING—A few go a long way is the general rule—that is, don't hang too many pictures in one room. The living room should contain pictures which guests would enjoy while the bedroom may be hung with the family portraits and photographs of a more personal nature. The shape of wall space should be considered and pictures or prints of similar shape or ones which seem to belong to that space should be chosen. Unless a picture is hung with screws directly on the wall, see that the wires up to the moulding are parallel with the sides of the picture rather than forming an angle at the moulding. Hang them as nearly as possible opposite the level of the eye when you are standing. Whenever possible, hang them so that they are under a side light. A plain side wall is better than a figured for setting off pictures.

GETTING RID OF TUBERCULAR COWS

Republican: Humboldt is getting rid of tuberculosis. The authorities have just closed a two weeks' testing campaign under the direction of W. A. Seidell of the animal health commission, and County Agent Pickard, Humboldt county. Forty herds tested totaling 881 head of cattle. From this number 66 reacted as tubercular animals out of twenty herds. Thus it will be seen that 50 percent of the herds subjected to the test were found to contain reactors. About seven percent of all cattle tested were found to be tubercular. This percentage is 3 percent less than was found last year, at which time 443 head were tested and 44 were found to react.

Two carloads of these reactors have already gone out, one from Rutland and one from Bode. The rest are being held under quarantine and will go out soon.

TURNING DOWN ADVS. EVERY WEEK NOW

Every week the Republican is turning down advertising orders from merchants at a distance. They are down because they conflict with the home business men. These advs. that are refused space in the Republican appear in many of the county papers and are thus distributed to a large number of readers.

The refusing to accept advertising that conflicts with home business is question that will be slowly threshed out by publishers of Iowa. Every year, however, the number of small papers that carry the advertising of every respectable firm placing an order and paying the bill, increases We believe it will be but a short time until practically every paper in Iowa will accept business from every responsible source

In this portion of the state the Fort Dodge merchants are the ones that are trying to break into the country press surrounding Fort Dodge. As a rule county seat papers have turned down the ads. from Fort Dodge but the papers in the smaller towns make a handsome thing off the Fort Dodge merchants. However, of late, Fort Dodge advertising has appeared in the county seat papers of Pocahontas, Clarion, Lake city and some of the better towns that are not county seats, like Manson, Rolfe, Luverne, Gilmore City and Livemore.

We believe that practically every paper in northwestern Iowa will, that is not objectionable.—Humboldt Republican.

The only time some men give the appearance of being clean is in the first ten minutes after leaving a barber's chair.

High School Holds Enjoyable Program At Methodist Church Friday Night

CHOOSE SCHOOL COLORS

The Meservey High School Literary society gave a splendid program on Friday night of last week at the Methodist church, which has been rented by the school for the holding of programs, etc.

The program was well attended and was very interesting to the audience, many comments of a favorable nature being heard of the way the various participants handled their parts, some of which were rather difficult. The program as given was as follows:

Song, America .... Audience
Story .... Esther Reverts
President's Address
... Agnes Fischer
Quartette—Anna Pals, Evelyn Thomas, Peter Koenen, W... Witt.
Original Story ....na Pals
Speech: Subject, Our Health ... Miss Clark
... Doctor Woodard
Speech ....
Song, Star Spangled Banner ..... Audience

The following high school colors were chosen: Black and Old Gold. ... by President. A free will offering was then given. Refreshments of ice cream and cookies were served to the high school students in the school building and various games were played. A good time was reported by everybody who was present.

POTATOES SOLD AT $1.45 A BUSHEL

Several carloads of potatoes were brought into town last week and sold at prices from $1.45 to $1.55 a bushel, prices which are much lower than they are in some of the other towns around. At these prices it did not take long to dispose of them, and one local dealer made the remark that he could have disposed of half a dozen carloads if he could have gotten them. Some of the potatoes were sold to out of town parties who found out that they were being sold here at prices below what had been asked in their home towns.

FARMERS BUSY PICKING CORN

Most of the farmers in this part of the country are busy now picking their corn, which is reported as being of fair yield. The snow flakes flying around last Friday reminded the farmers that Old Man Winter was on his way.

AUTO TRUCKS GETTING ALL THE HAULING

Very little poultry and eggs have been shipped out of here this summer by train, the auto trucks are getting the business. The railroads must soon realize that their war-time freight rates must come down if they expect to compete with the auto truck for the business.

Y. P. A. Meets.

The Y. P. A. met at the home of Rev. Schesselman on Tuesday evening Oct. 4th. About thirty were present. The evening was spent by first having the monthly business meeting, after which was given a short program and various games were played and etc.

Honor should be given to the hostess for the dainty luncheon which was served and which everybody did full justice too.

A fine time was reported by all present.

MESERVEY'S BALL TEAM LICKS KLEMME BUNCH

The ball teams of Meservey an Klemme crossed bats Sunday in the Meyer pasture and the result was that Klemme was defeated by the lop-sided score of 13 to 8. The game was a good one and contained some exciting moments.

Clarence Wiles of Klemme was in town one day last week.

Fishing is reported very good at Clear Lake now. Don't miss your last chance.

SUBSCRIBE FOR YOUR HOME TOWN PAPER

The Register comes before you this week for the second time. It is not all that we want to make it, nor that we expect to make it; it takes time to get things in the order that will permit you to do things as you want to do them. But as the weeks go by we promise to improve your home paper, to make it more attractive and more newsy.

But we must have your help, remember; upon your co-operation depends the success of the venture both to you and to us. All those who were on the lists of the former Register have been transfered to the lists of the present one, and you have been given credit for your subscription if you were paid in advance, whether it was for one month or two years. A good many of the subscriptions, however, expire in the near future, and the publisher hopes that those whose subscription runs out will renew their subscription to the Register.

The question of paying the two dollars need not worry you; we are willing to "take a chance" on you for any time up to a year, for we realize that two dollars right now cannot always be scared up. We have no doubt but what you will agree that the two papers are worth the two dollars—which does not pay for the paper alone in a year's time—and that you will think the two are worth 50 cents more than the one paper before. If you know that your subscription expires in the near future, just see Heinie, or drop him a card, saying you want your home paper and the home news, that you will scare up two dollars within the next twelve months, and Heinie will see that you get what you want.

And if you are not a subscriber, and want to have your home paper and home news, just do the same thing: SEE HEINIE! Because unless you do the Register will not be coming to your door every week. You have received a sample copy the past two weeks, and you may get a couple more—just to show you that the Register is going to be a worth-while proposition—but after that, if you get the home news you will have to borrow your neighbor's paper—and you don't want to be a "moocher," do you? Subscribe for the Meservey Register! See Heinie!

MISS MEINDERTS HAS THE NEWS

Miss Jennie Meinderts at the telephone office has charge of the news end of the Meservey Register, and she will greatly appreciate the matter if those who know the news will phone her, or tell her. To get all the news from any locality is a job beyond the possibilities of any one person, and if you will co-operate with Miss Meinderts the Register will have more of the home news than if she has to get it alone.

The Register invites each of the societies and clubs of Meservey to have the news of their meetings printed regularly.

TILING ROAD IN WISNER TOWNSHIP

The mile of road first sauth in Wisner township is being tiled on both sides of the road. This is the first step in the right direction for better roads. The mile has at times been in very poor condition. Thanks to the Franklin county officials.

A cemetery is not a place where a person wants to stay, but there is some satisfaction in knowing that the place will be taken care of when you do have to go there to stay.

The Cemetery society and Sexton of our cemetery are to be commended on the condition in which this place is kept. Some time ago a lady from Indiana attended a funeral here and made the remark that she did not think it were possible to keep such a neat condition except in the larger cities.

Our slang vocabulary has grown considerable the past few years. We now hear the following in many conversations:

"You tell 'em!" "I'll tell the world!" "That's grapes," "Oh man!" "Hello kiddo!" "That's Jake!" "Oh boy!" and many others that are unprintable. None of these phrases helps us in our conversation, but show a lack of concentration of mind on the subject spoken of, and very often is an indication of a loose screw or water on the brain.

SEE HEINIE FOR THE BUSINESS

H. F. Rief, better known as Heinie, is the business manager at Meservey for the Register. Heinie has full charge of the business end there, and will take care of your wants in the advertising line, attend to your needs in job work printing, and take your subscription for the Register at any time.

Heinie will help you fix up your ad, and see that you get your printed letterheads, envelopes or bills on the dot, and that you get a good job. See Heinie for business.

TRADED ONE SHEEP FOR HAIRCUT-SHAVE.

A. Wilkinson of Adams township is one of Wapello county's up to date farmers. He enjoys riding in his auto and having his hair shaved at the neck.

He dropped into one of Ottomwa's barber shops the other day and inquired the price of a haircut and shave. When the gentleman barber gave him the imformation wanted, he exploded. "It takes five bushels of oats or the price of a sheep to pay the bill," he said.

The tonsorial artist declared he would be willing to accept the sheep.

"It's a bargain," said the farmer.

Mr. Wilkinson went back to the farm and came in again today, bringing the sheep and delivering it to the shop, took his seat in the chair, asked for the haircut and shave, remarking, "Sheep are more plentiful in Wapello county than money."

The barber expects to rave quite a heavy trade in sheep with the farmers before next spring, if his razors and soap hold out.

Everybody at the school is busy taking the tests this week.

Mrs. Johanna Rozeboom returned home Saturday after a five weeks' visit at the home of her daughter, Mrs. H. K. Pals and family.

E. Noteboom is being treated at the Park hospital in Mason City.

Most auto accidents happen in the fall of the year. Enclosed cars are given as the reason.

AT ANY RATE, HE SECURED A MIGHTY FINE APPETITE

One of our local business men made a trip to Twin Lakes one day last week, expecting to come home like a conquering hero with a good number of ducks. But eith hreis aim was poor or someone had taken the shot out of the shells, because the ducks are still flying.

"CURFEW SHALL NOT RING TONIGHT"

Emmetsburg has passed a curfew ordinance which requires that all the young people under 18 years of age must be in their homes by 9:00 o'clock in the summer and 8:00 in the winter. We believe this is somewhat severe, but some of our young people appear to have very poor reasoning power when it comes to distinguising between what is proper and what is not. But this is not all; parents appear to be indifferent and allow their children to remain out until late hours and sooner or later have the shame that they could have avoided had they taken more interest in their young people instead of allowing them to run as they pleased.

GOT 99 CENTS FOR CORN

H. T. Halverson of near Leland, is not one of the farmers who is bemoaning the present conditions. He was in the office Friday to renew his subscription to the Summit, and incidently in asking about the weather, the times and the conditions under which most of us are existing, said that he was one of those who was satisfied—even to the prices.

He recently sold 1,800 bushels of last year's corn and about 300 bushels of oats that brought him more than $1,900.00. This statement brought out the fact that he got 99 cents per bushel for the corn and 52 cents per bushel for the oats—and this when others have been delivering corn and oats at less than half that price.

But Mr. Halverson did not deliver the corn and oats as might be the supposition—he delivered the hogs. Last fall he had fifty-eight pigs, and he just recently sold the last of them, as hogs, to which he had fed the corn and oats and from the process of selling the grain through the medium of pork realized the prices above stated.—Forest City Summit.

"COUNTRY CLUB" IS DESTROYED

The fire alarm was sounded about four o'clock last Friday morning. Soon a large crowd gathered but there was no excitement over the fire till it was found a tank car of gasoline stood on the siding just north of the box car on fire. The box had been removed from the trucks and set beside the tracks at a point at the west end of the stock yards. A stove was placed in it and it was supposed to be used as a place of shelter for coal heavers. Instead of serving for this porpose only it had become a habitat for those handy with pasteboards and spotted ivories. It was familiary known as the "Country Club" where "African Golf was played when most people were supposed to be asleep. Just how the fire started is not generally known. It may have been caused by a hobo, a party of poker players or a crap game. Be this as it may, the car burned up and those who sought its shelter once will do so no more. To make matters worse both strings of hose had been wound up wrong end to on the hose carts and even some of the sections were missing. Had this been a real fire this negligence might have been a serious affair. As it was the man power was able to push the gas tank out of danger before it ignited. But not so with a car load of coal. After the tardy arrival of the hose the fire in the car of coal was readily put out. Would it not be a wise act on the part of those in authority to see that the hose is properly wound, that the proper wrenches are in their proper places and that all taps on the hydrants are in good working order.—Corwith Hustler.

When is a Battery Old?

Some men are young at eighty —others are old at forty.

It's about the same way with batteries.

Their usefulness depends on the care they have had, the amount of work they have had to do, how they have been used, and most important of all—on the original quality of the battery.

There are many good reasons back of the decisions of the manufacturers of 173 cars and trucks to use Willard Threaded Rubber Batteries.

Come in and we'll tell you more about them.

A gentleman from near Rowan, who has recently returned from a trip to Minnesota, is reported as describing the forced sale of a farmer in that country, in which the neighbors all were present but every one of them flatly refused to bid on a single article, and the sale had to be called off. The landlord then told the farmer to go ahead an do the best he could to meet his bills. An idea which it would seem any landlord ought to know enough to see without forcing a sale.

Mr. and Mrs. Perry Loomis and C. W. Trees returned recently from their trip to points in the Dakotas and Montana. They left here on the first of September and got back on the 26th. They transacted business at Wibeaux, and visited friends and relatives there and at other points in that vicinity. They state that there are thousands of acres of wheat in that country which has not and will not be cut, wheat almost shoulder high. The pastures are so short, the grass so dead and burnt, that hundreds and thousands of cattle will and are now starving. To ship them to points where there is feed would cost more than the animal is worth. In North Dakota they saw wheat that wasn't worth the cutting, eight to ten inches high. But the roads up in that country they pronounce the best that they have ever seen, all grravel, level and smooth, for mile after mile. C. W. says that Perry stepped on her for 55 miles and hour, which is proof that they must have been good roads because Perry is noted in Belmond for his careful driving. They made the trip in Mr. Loomis' Cadillac, and averaged over 11 miles to the gallon of gas on the entire trip.

FARM BUREAU NEWS ITEMS

ONE BILLION LIFTS HOPES

The buying power of the consuming public will be steadily increased during the next six months. The worst of the depression is over. Confidence is being gradually and surely restored. Optimism for better farm markets is thoroly justified. The trough of the depression is passed. Unemployment is exaggerated. The livestock business is the key to the whole agricultural situation. Stockmen will regain confidence when the War Finance corporation puts millions of dollars of credit into their industry—advances fully warranted on the basis of feed supplies and future markets. The return of a prosperous livestock industry means profitable markets for grain and forage.

COTTON ADVANCES STIMULATE

Recent advances in cotton have already restored the buying owner of 27,000,000 people and the stimulating effect is seen everywhere. The livestock industry will experience a revival similar to the cotton industry. The farmer who goes confidently ahead now will benefit. Feeding will be done at a profit.

The War Finance corporation has plenty of confidence and plenty of credit, and is anxious to put both into the agricultural industry of America quickly and largely. The individual farmer may avail himself promptly of War Finance corporation credit to any extent which his business deserves by applying thru his co-operative association or thru his local bank. Forms may be secured upon application to the district committees, or directly of the War Finance corporation. Washington, D. C. The government charges 6 per cent for the money and the bank or co-operative organization lends it to the farmer at any rate not exceeding two per cent above that paid the War Finance corporation, i. e., from six to eight per cent.

These advances will enable the farmer to hold his goods until they may be sold in an orderly fashion on a stable market. The loans may be rediscounted for any period up to one year, and may be renewed for the second year, or even the third year. There is a minimum of red tape connected with this $1,00,000,000 in credit for the farmer. The government is anxious to lend it and to aid agriculture in attaining stable and profitable markets.

These assurances came officially from Eugene Meyer, Jr., managing director of the War Finance corporation, at a cnference called by President Howard with state farm bureau representatives in the general offices of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Chicago on Sept. 28th. They constitute one of the most heartening developements for American agriculture since the depression began in the spring of 1920.

GROWERS GET LOAN OF FIFTEEN MILLION

The first line of credit authorized by the War Finance corporation under its new power to assist agriculture goes to the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., for co-operators in the northwest. J. M. Anderson, vice president and chairman of the sales committee, of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., in Washington last week, obtained favorable action on an application for $15,000,000 the funds to become available at once. This will enable the U. S. Grain Growers' sales committee adequately to finance grain marketing for thousands of members in the northwest who insist upon using the new co-operative machinery without delay. The grain is being handled thru the Equity Co-operative Exchange, St. Paul, under authority of a resolution passed by U. S. Grain Growers' executive committee authorizing Mr. Anderson to complete arrangements for handling the grain of members of the nortnwest.

Mr. Anderson Mr. Schilling and U. L. Burdick, all directors in zone 2, at a recent conference decided to advance growers sixty-five to seventy-five per cent of the present market price. This will enable growers to hold their grain until the market reflects the true value. Prices have been unduly depressed by the unprecedented dumping of grain on all markets this fall. The determination to withhold northwest grain from the terminal markets for the present is keeping with recommendations made by such students of world conditions as Secretary of Cemmerce Herbert Hoover.

LIVESTOCK SHIPPING ASSOCIATION SHORT COURSES

Approximately 25 per cent of Iowa's livestock was being marketed by the Livestock Shipping associations at the close of 1920. Fully 50 per cent of the Iowa farmers have at one time or another participated in co-operative shipments. Co-operative livestock shipping is not a new venture.

At the close of 1920 shipping associations in Iowa were handling fully 25 per cent of the livestock market shipments, on the farm to market route, a total of approximately 50,000 cars with a valuation of $103,837,000. These figures are based upon figures furnished by associations. The average volume of car shipments for 342 associations in 1920 was 77, and the average valuation based on 1920 prices was $2,076.74. This means then that the average association did a business of $159,885.88.

The volume of business would no doubt double if carried thru to its logical conclusion. Even in its present condition it represents a business considerably larger than that of the world-famous California Fruit Growers' Exchange.

The membership roll of these associations ranged from 50 to 200. Based on these numbers it is certain that over 100,000 or over half of the farmers of the state have at one time or another participated in co-operative livestock shipments.

The peculiar feature of the co-operative shipments, that of several owners of stock being included in one car, has developed many problems. Among them comes a satisfactory method of marking and selling of each man's stock; prorating the returns and the charging of each owner's account with the proper expense items as freight, insurance, feed and manager's fee. Few associations have been able to develope a method of keeping such accounts in a satisfactory manner.

Managers and executive boards of associations are realizing the need of simple and accurate accounts; a growing volume of business and a large active membership also demand such accounts. Numerous requests have been made to the Farm Bureaus for assistance in this work.

In answer to this call the marketing agents of the corn belt states have developed a uniform systef of simple accounts for live stock shipping associations. These accounts will be presented during one day of the conference as announced in last week's paper. Each man in attendance will be given forms and will actually enter a shipment in the new account book. Other business organizations demand that accurate checks be kept on their finances. It is now being demanded by this new marketing organization. Managers and officers desiring to attend the course at Fort Dodge on Oct. 20 and 21, or Mason City on Oct. 25 and 26 should register at once on blanks which may be secured at the farm bureau office. Watch the papers for further details and information. Full details may be secured at the farm bureau office.

FALL WEB WORMS ACTIVE

The fall web worms which are attacking the shade trees at this time of the season can be controlled, say the entomologists at Iowa State College, if the nests are cut out of the trees and burned. Recent reports from various parts of the state show that these worms are very active

Web worms attack the trees in the spring and then break out again in the fall and proceed to lay eggs which will hatch in the spring. The second brood do considerable more damage than the first brood.

Where trees are small the webworms can be controlled by spraying. For this purpose lead arsenate at the rate of two pounds of powdered form or four pounds of paste to fifty gallons of water.

Where the worms have attacked the trees in a large swarm burning off the roups might do more damage than the worms would if left. Where this is the case many of the worms can be eliminated by taking a long pole with a bristle brush on the end and insert into the nest and wind around so that the nest will be easily pulled down.

According to the entomologists many parasites which kill these worms are found eating them so that another year less damage is expected. However, anyone having the fine shade trees that are attacked by web worms had better take measures for their control.

Prejudices may be some satisfaction but they don't do to bet on.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

CHAPTER VI.—To get proper surgical aid, John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Dale convey "Babe," unconscious, to the city. Doctors assure them she is not seriously hurt. Dale meets an old friend, Bobby McLaurin, who had married Patricia Clavering. Telling his father of David Moreland's coal, the old gentleman's actions convince his son of his father's guilt in the killing of Moreland.

CHAPTER VII.—It is arranged that "Babe" is to stay with Mrs. McLaurin to be educated. Dale, refusing his father's proffered financial aid to develop the mine, interests Newton Wheatley, capitalist, who agrees to furnish the money. Dale realizes he loves "Babe."

CHAPTER VIII. — Returning to the Halfway Switch, Dale meets Major Bradley, lawyer, and real friend of the mountaineers, whom he engages as counsel for the company. A man named Goff, of evil repute, tries to bribe Dale to betray the Morelands by selling him the coal deposits, and telling them they are of little value. Dale attempts to thrash him, but Goff draws a revolver. Dale is unarmed.

CHAPTER IX.—Goff enlists the aid of a turbulent crowd, the Balls and Torreys, to make trouble for Dale's company. The Littlefords and Morelands agree to forget the old feud and dwell in harmony.

The mountaineer didn't answer.

"You won't throttle the cause born in David Moreland's good heart on account of a little personal pride—I know you won't!" Dale said earnestly.

Moreland straightened.

"You mean well," he said slowly. "I think you're one o' the very best men in the world, Bill Dale. You often make me think o' pore David himself. But I'm afeared ye don't quite onderstand, Bill. I've seed my own son die from a Littleford's bullet. To go and offer to be friends with a man who might be the same one 'at killed my boy is a pow'ful hard thing to do. I'm afeard ye don't quite onderstand."

"It was a terrible thing, I know," said Dale. "But it was the fortunes of war. The Littlefords have endured the fortunes of war in exactly the same way. Come with me; let's go. I need your help; I can do very little without your help. Come, John Moreland!"

The hillman replied slowly: "Well, I'll go with ye over thar. But Ben he'll haf to make the fust break at a-bein' friends, 'cause I'm purty shore I never will. As soon as I git my hat, Bill."

He went to the front porch and took from a chairpost his broad-rimmed headgear. Then the two set out.

They crossed an ox-wagon road, a sweet-scented meadow, the river by means of the blown-down sycamore, another sweet-scented meadow and another ox-wagon road, and entered the cabin yard of the Littleford chief. Here, too, many old-fashioned flowers were in bloom; a cane fishingpole, slender and white, leaned against the porch; it made Dale think of Babe. . . .

"You wait out here," whispered Dale, with a hand on his companion's arm. "I'll go in and see if I can persuade Littleford to make the advance. I'm pretty sure I can."

He started forward when a hound rose from the stone step and growled warningly. At that Dale halted and sang out:

"Hello, Ben!"

The front door swung open, creaking on wooden hinges, and Babe's father, bareheaded and with a lamp in his hand, appeared in the doorway. He knew the voice that had summoned him.

"Come right in, Mr. Dale," he invited with the utmost cordiality. "Come right in!"

He scolded the dog away, and Dale entered the primitive home. He was shown into the best room, where he dropped easily into a roomy old rocker that was lined with an untanned sheepskin. Ben Littleford put the lamp on a crude table, drew up another chair, and sat down facing his visitor.

"I hope ye ain't jest happened over fo' a minute or two on business," he drawled; "I hope ye've come to spend the night wi' me, anyway."

"I'm here in the interests of peace," Dale began, looking at the hillman squarely. "I want you Littlefords to be on good terms with your neighbors, the Morelands. John is out there at your gate now; he is waiting for you to ask him in and say to him: 'Let's begin anew; let's be friends, your people and my people, you and me.' You want that, don't you, Ben? Babe did, I'm sure."

Littleford frowned, laced his big fingers together and twirled his big thumbs. Now that he was once more at home, with assurance that his daughter would entirely recover, he was no longer weak; he had all his old courage and all his old, stubborn hill pride back.

"I'll ax John in," he finally decided, "but he'll haf to make the fust break at a-bein' friends. Me axin' him into my house is a purty durned good start toward friendship, ain't it?"

He arose, took up the lamp, walked to the front door and opened it, and called into the night:

"Won't ye come in, John?"

"I reckon I will, Ben," was the lazy answer. "Fo' a minute, anyhow. But I reckon I cain't stay long."

Moreland followed Littleford into the best room. Littleford put the lamp beside the worn leather-bound Bible on the table, and they sat down. They looked steadily at each other, and Dale saw plainly that both were ill at ease. Surely, thought Moreland, he had done a great deal when he had come into his old enemy's house. Surely, thought Littleford, he had done a great deal when he had asked John Moreland into his home.

Came a silence that was heavy. Each was depending upon the other to make the advance. The two clansmen stared at each other more and more sharply, and soon shadows of bitterness began to creep into their eyes.

Then Major Bradley, guest of Ben Littleford, strode into the room with a patrician and soldierly air, and he understood the situation perfectly.

"Gentlemen," he urged, "shake hands. Be friends."

They didn't. Neither seemed to have heard the major. It angered Bill Dale. His knowledge of these feudists, these grown-up children, was not yet very thorough. He went to his feet. John Moreland, too, arose.

"We'd as well go, hadn't we?" Dale clipped, and there was disgust in his voice.

"I reckon we had," agreed Moreland.

They walked out of the cabin, leaving Major Bradley and Ben Littleford gazing silently after them. At the gate Dale caught John Moreland's sleeve and halted him.

"Why on earth," he demanded, "didn't you make the break?"

"Bill Dale, I went into his house!"

Dale put his hands on one of the weatherbeaten gateposts and looked over to where a bright star burned like a beacon light above the pine-fringed crest of David Moreland's mountain. He continued to look at the star, his face gray, until it glimmered.

Then he began to blame himself; he was the hope of a benighted people, and he had foolishly lost his temper at a crucial moment! He wondered whether it was yet too late, and turned his eyes toward his silent companion. He saw that John Moreland was looking toward the beacon star—

The voice of Ben Littleford came to them plainly because the night was so very still; he was reading from the Gospel according to Saint Mark, preparatory to his bedtime prayer. The two at the gate listened intently. The way in which the illiterate giant stumbled over the simplest words was pitiful. . . .

The hillman closed the Good Book and placed it on the table beside him. There was the low shuffling of feet as half a dozen persons knelt at their chairs. The prayer which followed was much like John Moreland's own bedtime prayer; it had in it less of supplication than of thanksgiving.

And—in the tail of it there were words that were like bullets to the mountaineer at the gate—

"—Bless the good man who is with us here tonight, and all o' our kinfolks, and all o' our friends, and all o' our inemies—and 'specially the Morelands. Aymen!"

Dale's hand came down hard on John Moreland's shoulder.

"You told me he wouldn't do it!"

The old clan leader hung his head, like a man suddenly broken. He replied not a word; he seemed amazed into speechlessness. He had been wrong in his estimate of Ben Littleford; he had lied about a man who had just asked the good Almighty to bless him. John Moreland choked a little and started toward the cabin. He walked as though half blind across the porch, and entered without knocking, and went in to Ben Littleford with his right hand outstretched.

"Le's begin anew," he said huskily. "Le's be friends, yore people and my people, you and me!"

Littleford arose and groped for his old-time enemy's hand, found it and grasped it in both his own.

"You're better 'an I am, John Moreland," he said—"you're a d—d sight better 'an I am."

When Dale left them, they were talking over a great bear-hunt that they had taken together a score of years before.

The moon, full and as bright as new gold, had risen just under the beacon star when Bill Dale reached the doorstep of the cabin that was home to him. He faced about. The broad green valley lay very serene and very beautiful there in the mellow light. There was no sound save for the gentle murmuring of the crystal river.

"You wonderful place," he said softly, then added: "My own country!"

CHAPTER X

The Barbarian Princess Goes Home.

Miss Elizabeth Littleford beheld an interesting sight when she alighted from a northbound afternoon train at the Halfway switch. Just below the long siding a shorter siding had been put in—the railway company had been hastened, no doubt, by the great influence of old Newton Wheatley—and from it had been unloaded a small geared locomotive, a dozen or so of little coal cars opening at the bottom, and miles of light steel rails with kegs of spikes for them.

Out toward her home a crew of men worked like bees at the building of a trestle of round timbers that had been cut from the nearby woods; she at once recognized these men as Morelands and Littlefords, and she knew it meant peace! They didn't recognize her, because of the distance and the clothing she wore, and because they were too busy to pay any particular attention to her.

Farther out toward Doe river another crew of men was at work clearing the way for the little narrow-gauge. She heard the sounds of the ax and the saw, the hammer and the steel, and once there came to her ears the great dull roar of exploding dynamite as a cliff was blown clear of its foundations.

Miss Elizabeth Littleford smiled happily. And she had not been happy for a long time. Patricia McLaurin, with whom she ha dbeen staying, had been kindness itself, but the mother of Bill Dale, her Bill Dale, had snubbed her—and besides the longing for the old home hills was riotous in her blood. So she had come back, run away at less than a moment's notice—as had Bill Dale before her, and how good it seemed to be at home! She would have gone to see the men, had it not been that she feared she would be a bother.

There was another interesting sight when she had reached the crest of David Moreland's mountain. In the upper end of the broad valley, midway between the "settlement" and the opening of the Moreland coal vein, two large buildings were well along in their course of construction.

She put down her bundle of clothing, shaded her eyes with her hand, and tried to find Bill Dale among the builders. But the distance was too great; a man down there was but a mere speck. . . . Before she went on, she removed her shoes and stockings. It was hard for Babe Littleford to become accustomed to wearing useless shoes and stockings in warm weather!

When she had reached the foot of the mountain, she didn't take the bypath her people had been wont to use in order that they might avoid contact with the Morelands. There was no need of avoiding contact with the Morelands now, thank goodness!

Then a voice hailed her from the laurels out at her right, the voice she loved better than any other—

"Hello, Miss Littleford!"

Babe stopped and faced him, and she blushed furiously when she saw him. He was coming rapidly toward her with his hat in his hand, and his brown hair was rumpled and damp with perspiration. She saw that he was in boots and corduroys, the clothing of a timber-jack, and he looked bigger in them; about his waist there was a cartridge-belt, from which hung a big and dependable looking revolver in a leathern holster.

"Hello, Mister Dale!" she mimicked.

He shook her hand, then he dropped to a moss-covered log that lay beside the narrow trail.

"Sit down here beside me," he said; and he added: "I've been going hard all day, and I'm pretty tired."

She let fall her bundle and her shoes and stockings, and obeyed.

"Why did you come back, Babe?" he asked as though he were displeased.

"'Cause," she answered—and she corrected herself quickly, "I mean because."

"No reason whatever," smiled Dale.

"Well," and her clear brown eyes looked at him squarely, "I come back because yore mother she said I would be a burden to Mis' McLaurin, that's why."

"Mrs. McLaurin," said Dale; "not Mis' McLaurin."

"A burden to Mrs. McLaurin, and I ain't a-goin' to be a burden to nobody!" vehemently. In a softer voice, she went on, "Mrs. McLaurin and her husband and her folks has done made up friendly, Bill Dale. Mrs. McLaurin's pap—I mean her father—he brung 'em a big lot o' silver things. . . .

"Bill Dale, I had a big time! Everybody liked me but yore own maw—I mean yore mother. My goodness gracious—they dress awful fine, don't they? Why, silk ain't nothin'. But whar all o' their money comes from, I shore cain't see. Say, I showed some o' Pat's friends how to dance our old hill dances, and the whole town was crazy about 'em when I left. Jimmy Fayne is awful good-lookin' and rich, ain't he, Bill? He liked me better'n any of 'em, 'less it was Pat herself. You know Jimmy, don't ye, Bill?"

Dale nodded, frowned, and turned his sober gaze toward the toes of his high laced boots. Yes, he knew Jimmy Fayne, and he held him in contempt. The pampered son of a wealthy cotton speculator, weak, devoted to high nights, remarkably handsome to romantic and unsophisticated girls but not to men and women who had cut their wisdom-teeth—that was Jimmy Fayne.

Babe Littleford was speaking again: "I 'cided to come back here, Bill Dale, because I thought they might need me here as well as because I was afeard I would be a burden to Pat—I mean afraid I would be a burden to Pat. Seems like I cain't talk proper at all! I've tried and tried. I've spent half o' my time jest a-tryin' to talk proper. Pat, she'd put down words I mustn't say on a sheet o' paper, and I'd study 'em. Afeard, shore, pap, 'cause, ain't, hain't—and all o' them. And she'd put down the right words with 'em so's I'd know.

"Yore mother was the last to come to see me, Bill. 'So this,' she says to Pat, 'is the "barbarian princess!"' I didn't know what that meant, but I 'spect it's somethin' bad. I went into the house, because I didn't want to say anything, and her yore own mother. But I listened, and I heard her say the rest, and this is it:

"'What will you do when the in-innovation wears off, Patricia?' she says. 'She'll be a burden to you, Patricia; you'll have a half-savage person tagging after you, like a lady bear!'

"That's what it was she said, Bill Dale. . . . I'm shore they do need me here, and I ax ye this, Bill Dale: Are you sorry to see me come back?"

"Perhaps they do need you." Dale slowly stripped the tiny leaves from a fern. "But that is not sufficient reason to warrant your staying here. Of course, I'm not sorry to see you, Babe. But you must go back to Patricia very soon. If you had been a burden to Patricia, she would have told you."

Babe put out a foot and idly rolled an acorn across the path with one bare big toe.

"But I—I don't think I want to go back," she protested. "I'd rather stay here, a heap rather."

"But you must go back," declared Dale, "You really must."

Ben Littleford's daughter was silent. For a moment she absently watched the playful antics of a little boomer squirrel on the side of a nearby hickory. Then she arose.

"Look," she urged—it was one of the charming wiles of her—"Look at my new dress. Me and Pat made it, every stitch of it. Don't you think it's nice?"

"Sure, it's nice," Dale agreed. "But any dress looks nice on you, Babe. If only you'd stick with Mrs. McLaurin and let her educate you! You shouldn't have cared anything about what my mother said; my mother doesn't always see things in the true light. You'll go back, won't you?"

She bent toward him and asked pointedly:

"Bill Dale, what makes you so anxious fo' me to go?"

"Because," readily, "I want you to have an education."

"What makes you want me to have a education, Bill Dale?"

"Because you'd be such a splendid woman, if you had an education."

Babe Littleford pursued with child-like eagerness: "And what makes you want me to be such a s-splendid woman?"

Dale lifted his gray eyes and answered her frankly:

"Because I expect to marry you some day."

Babe Littleford blushed deeply. Her eyes were glad, filled with rejoicing. If he didn't love her now, at least just a weeny-teeny bit, he wouldn't be thinking of marrying her some day, certainly, and this conclusion made her happier than she had ever been in all her life before. She wished wildly that she could hug him with all her might—and she had a big notion to do it. But what would he think of her?

Well, there would come a day when she would surely hug him with all her might. She would simply break his blessed bones, almost.

"Will you go to Patricia tomorrow?" he asked.

She really believed that she ought to go. But the thought of leaving him was more hateful than ever, now that she knew he meant to marry her. She strove to change the subject—

"See that little, teeny flower over there—that little, teeny, blue one?" she asked, pointing. "That's a dayflower. It's the purest blue of any. They call it a dayflower because it don't last but jest one single day." And again, pointing: "See that little, teeny, purple flower over there at them twisted laurels? That's called Job's tears, and they don't last but one day, neither. That little red, spidery thing is bee balm. Over yander at the hick'ry is monkshood. I l'arned the names out o' a book Major Bradley loant me. Hadn't we better be a-goin' toward home? It—it'll be a-comin' dark purty soon, won't it?"

Said Dale, "Will you go back to Patricia tomorrow?"

"I—I've been a-wonderin'," murmured Babe. "Which is proper, Bill, bust or burst?"

Dale spoke quickly. "Burst for you, bust for me. Will you go back to Patricia?"

Beaten, Babe Littleford drew a long breath and smiled.

"Yes, Mister Dale," she answered resignedly. "I will. I'll go whar—where you want me to go, ef—if it's to Torment. Now tell me how it comes that I find my people and their inemies as thick as m'lasses in a jug, while we walk on."

• • • • • • • •

When Dale returned to John Moreland's cabin from having seen Babe Littleford safely to her father's door, he found Major Bradley and By Heck waiting at the gate. Heck had some important, bad news, he said.

"Better not tell me about it until after supper," replied Dale. "I'm as hungry as you ever were, By."

They went in to sit down to one of the best meals Addie Moreland had ever prepared. When they had finished eating, John Moreland led the way into the best room, where they took chairs. The major produced cigars. By Heck, swollen with a feeling of greatness, lighted the wrong end of his weed, faced Dale, and began to unburden his mind of its weight of information.

"Well, Bill, old boy," he began—and then stopped to wonder why his cigar wouldn't smoke as well as the major's. "Well, Bill, old boy," he went on, finally. "Henderson Goff, he's shore been as busy as a one-armed man in a bumblebee's nest. I cain't see, igod, what's wrong with this here seegyar. He's went and brung about twenty-five Torreys from two places knowed as Jerus'lem cove and Hatton's hell, to help work his mine when he gits it. They're all a-puttin' up with them Balls. The Torreys is part Injun, Cherokee Injun, and I've heered it said 'at they was as bad or wuss'n rattlesnake broth."

Major Bradley blew a little cloud of smoke upward. "More of the game of bluff, perhaps," he suggested.

"I'm inclined to think so," thoughtfully said Dale. "Well, we'll avoid trouble as long as we decently can; and when we can no longer get around it, we'll call in as much of the law as we can get, and meet it half-way. Eh, Hayes?"

"Sure," nodded the mining expert.

Dale was on his way to the new siding the following morning, when he met Henderson Goff. Again Dale was forcibly reminded of stories he had heard and read of Mississippi river steamboat gamblers of the long ago. Goff stepped out of the trail, smiled and spoke with apparent good humor. Dale passed him without a word.

Then the shyster coal man called out, "Ready to sell yet?"

The Moreland Coal company's manager halted and faced about with a puckering of his brows.

"For a fair price, yes."

"Just what would you call a fair price?"

"Oh, somewhere between two and three hundred thousand," promptly.

Goff sniffed, and the corners of his mouth came down.

"You don't want much. You won't get it from me!"

"I don't want it from you."

Dale turned and went on. He was sorry that he had stopped to talk with the fellow.

That afternoon he again met Goff in the trail. The bare sight of the shyster made him very angry now, and his right hand fell upon the butt of the big revolver on his hip. Goff was about to sidestep in the laurels, when Dale caught him roughly by the arm.

"See here," he said sharply, "you've about cut your little swath. We've had enough of you. You can't get this coal at any price, and the sooner you get yourself out of this country the better and safer it will be for you. To be plain, I'm pretty apt to thrash you the very next time I see you. Now move on!"

Goff went off laughing wickedly. "Oh, all right, Dale; go ahead and build the little road for me!" he said.

Late that night every sleeper in the valley of the Doe was awakened by a great, rumbling explosion, which was followed almost immediately by another great, rumbling explosion. Before the reverberations had died away, Bill Dale had dressed himself and was standing on the vine-hung front porch, and he was only a few seconds ahead of John Moreland.

Then there came the tearing sound of a heavy explosion miles to the eastward.

"Do ye know what it is?" inquired the mountaineer.

"They've stolen our dynamite from the tobacco-barn, and blown up the office and supplies building and the commissary building; also they've blown up the big trestle near the siding," Dale answered.

"'At's my guess, too," said Moreland.

Within the next half hour Dale and Hayes, Major Bradley, and the menfolk of the Morelands and the Littlefords had gathered around the wreck of the two big, unfinished frame buildings. Dale blamed himself much for having left dynamite unguarded in the tobacco-barn—but nobody else blamed him for it.

"It's time to let the law in," he said when he had viewed the jumbled mass of broken planks and timbers by the light of lanterns. He turned to stalwart Luke Moreland.

"You get on my horse and ride to Cartersville for the sheriff. Tell him he can get the best posse in the world right here, if he needs one. It's the proper thing, isn't it, major?"

"Yes," said Major Bradley, "it's the proper thing. You've got a real grievance now. But I fancy Goff had nothing to do with this; he is shrewd enough to know that a thing like this would cook his goose. Goff has been playing a bluff game all along, you know. Some Balls or some Torreys, perhaps a mixture of both, have done this without Goff's knowing anything about it. I'd have Sheriff Flowers arrest several of the Balls and several of the Torreys, and try to scare them into turning state's evidence to save themselves."

The major finished in a low tone, because of the probability for eavesdroppers, and in this he was wise.

"We'll do that," Dale decided.

He faced Hayes, his right-hand man, and began to give orders like a veteran general manager. The men were to take their rifles with them to work in the morning, but they were to fire no shot unless it was in defense of life or property. In the morning every available wagon in the valley was to be sent to the little sawmill that was in operation ten miles toward the lowland for more building material.

By Heck joined them then. He guessed just what had happened, plucked at Dale's sleeve and whispered:

"Sposen I takes a sneak or two toward them lowdown, walnut-eyed, knock-kneed, dadblamed Balls and Torreys and finds out what I can find out; hey, Bill?"

The answer came readily: "Sure, you be detective. But be careful that you don't lose anything for us, y' know, if you don't gain anything."

By Heck and his rifle disappeared in the darkness of the mountain night.

A little after work-time that day, Bill Dale started alone on the way of the narrow-gauge railroad for the siding. He wished to see for himself just what the damage had been to the trestle, and he hoped to meet Goff, or a Ball, or a Torrey, and learn something that would be to his advantage.

Before he had covered two miles, he had seen two of the enemy skulking through the woods, and he recognized them for Torreys from Jerusalem Cove and Hatton's Hell; he knew it by their very swarthy skin, their high cheekbones and their coarse black hair, the outcroppings of the Cherokee Indian blood in them. They looked cunning and wicked. Dale loosened in its holster the big revolver that Major Bradley had persuaded him to carry for his own protection. John Moreland had taught him how to use firearms.

At a point near where the little stream that flowed past the Halfway switch emptied into Doe river, where Doe river turned almost squarely to the left, Dale halted abruptly. He had seen a man dart behind a scrubby oak some thirty yards ahead of him; quite naturally, he concluded that the fellow meant to waylay him, and he, too, stepped behind a tree, a big hemlock.

A silent minute went by. Then Dale put his hat out on one side of the tree and peeped from the other side; it was an old trick that Grandpap Moreland had told him about. A rifle cracked promptly and sharply, and a bullethole appeared in the rim of his hat!

Following it, there came the coarse, bass voice of Black Adam Ball, the mountaineer Goliath:

"You cain't fool me. I jest shot to put a hole in yore new hat and to show ye 'at I ain't no bad shot. You cain't hit my hat!"

Dale's temper, the temper that had always been so hard to keep under control, rose quickly. He tried to reason with himself, and couldn't; his passion mastered him. He snatched the big revolver from its holster and cocked it. With as steady a hand as ever held a weapon trained, he began to take aim at Ball's slouch hat, the half of which was in plain view at one side of the scrubby oak.

"I fooled you once, back there in the middle of the river," he cried hotly, "and now I'm going to fool you again!"

There was in his voice that old, old primitive rage, which frightened him, and puzzled him too, in his better moments.

He let down the bead until it was barely visible in the notch, and eased off the trigger. The revolver roared and spat forth a tiny tongue of flame and a little cloud of white smoke. Ball sprang erect, wheeled, and fell crashing to the leaves!

HAMPTON MAN SKIPS WITH ANOTHER GIRL

Chronicle: Walter Kitsmiller, who has been operating a farm under lease in the north part of Oakland township, during the past year or two is charged with wife desertion, charges having been filed by his wife with County Attorney R. R. Stuart last week. That is not all, when Kitsmiller disappeared from his home Miss Ruth Sisam, the nineteen year-old daughter of J. E. Sisam, a well known Oanland township farmer came up missing, too.

Kitsmiller, who is twenty-nine years of age, has a wife but no children. They had some quarrels recently concern'ng the Sisam girl, as Mrs. Kitsmiller accused her husband of being too familiar with the girl on numerous occasions.

One n'ght last week the pair left their homes, and it is supposed that they went together. Kitsmiller drove his team to Burdette and left it tied to a post alongside of the street, and it is evident that he took the train from that point. Before leaving he sold some livestock which he had mortgaged, and from what can be learned he had at least $300 or $400 with him when he left.

Relatives of the couple have no idea of where they went, but some of them surmise that they headed for Canada.

DO THEY ROLL THEIR OWN OR USE TAILOR MADES?

A certain man in Belmond—who, for the sake of safety, we shall leave nameless(his safety) was talking the other day with ye editor, and he tells us a tale of the county seat.

Says he: "I went into the ——— bank there last week to see about some business, and just as I stepped inside the door two pretty girls in the bank reached up, took a final drag, and then heaved the butts into the corner."

"Aw, now," says we, "you don't mean to tell us that they were hittin' the pills!"

"So help me," says he, "they were, and they seemed to be getting some satisfaction out of 'em, too," says he.

Do they roll their own, or use the dainty tailor-made, over in the county seat town? We wonder. M— brothers Harwood or King can put us wise. Of course, we don't vouch for this, y'understand; it was just told to us. But he's a pretty straight man, at that, and we dunno.

REST ROOM ENTERTAINS ONE HUNDRED AND SEVEN

The Rest Room of the city was the hostess of one hundred and seven persons last month, of whom 44 were out of town guests. No meetings were held in that month, these people being simply individual registers. It would seem from the number registered that the city rest room serves a fine purpose, and it is to be hoped that those who have it in charge willsee the'r way clear to keep the rest room going the year round.

EDITOR'S PRAYER

"Almighty and Kind Father who doth from thy throne look down on the goverment of men and delinquent subscribers: Most humbly do we beseech Thee to draw near to them and whisper a few things into their ears that the statutes forbid us to print. Thou knowest our wants but the subscriber knoweth them not and seldom stops to inquire. Let it be known to them that there be large patches in the homestead of our pants and that there is an aching void in front of our backs and that we hunger and thirst and he asketh us not to sup with him. Thou knowest, O Lord, that our print paper and ink cost money but the subscriber knoweth it not and careth a darn sight less. Thou knoweth that we are cold and the subscriber bringeth not the wood that he promised and we are shivering and shaking while he roasteth his shins before the red hot stove of his mother-in-law. Tell him all these th'ngs Lord, and if he faileth and bringeth no succor, banish him to the lower regions to dwell among the calamity howlers and Thine shall be the glor and praise throughout our newspaper career.—Amen.—Exchange

N. M. WOLCOTT'S LAND MAY HAVE OIL ON IT

The Independent is in receipt of a letter from N. M. Wolcott of Des Moines in which he tells of the excitement at and in the vicinity of Lemmon, S. D., and in North Dakota over the oil that they think maybe they will find. Mr. Wolcott says: "the one in North Dakota  may be near or on my old homestead claim which I still own, and if they should strike a gusher I will run an Independent pipe line to Belmond and thru to Des Moines Wouldn't that be fine? And I could then dictate to Uncle John D. where to head in at and put the prices down on him!"

"I WONDER WHO'S KISSING HER NOW."

And almost countless other songs and stories have to do with the biggest appeal in human life—the appeal to the love of home and home folks that lies deep down in the hearts of everyone.

The bitter-sweet speculation on the old sweetheart's present affair; the amusing recollection of some odd chap you used to know "back home"; the wondering self-queries concerning the dear old people who were your neighbors, and the jolly old chums of youthful days—

EAT MORE CORN

Register and Leader—Co-operation of commerical organizations, merchants, millers, farmers and the general public in an "eat more corn" campaign is to be sought by the Des Moines and Iowa chambers of commerce, George E. Hamilton, secretary of the Des Moines chamber, announced yesterday at a luncheon of the Lions club at Hotel Savery. Better prices for corn, and consequent improvment of business condit'ons in this state would result from success in such a campaign, he declared.

Every trade and industrial organization in the state, Mr Hamilton said, w'll be invited to help. The campaign will be directed on lines similar to those which proved successful in general selling campaigns conducted by the California Fruit and Raisin Growers association when reduced consumption of fruit and raisins had carried the prices of those products below the profit level.

Efforts will be started in Iowa, he said, and extended thruout thhe middlewest and finally the nation if facilities for doing so are developed. Corn has been neglected as a food factor, Mr. Hamilton pointed, and he declared its household use could be enormously increased by educational efforts among housewives. He made the point that a comparatively small addition to the per capita consumption would exert a powerful beneficial influence on market conditions.

Officials of the Iowa Chamber of Commerce sa'd there is every prospect of cordial support for the movement thruout the state. They recalled that home consumption of corn was greatly increased during the war when wheat conversation was a national duty and said Iowa citizens have a powerful motive, in the desire to improve agricultural conditions in the state, for resorting again to corn consumption standards as praticed in wartime. Domestic use of corn on something approaching the 1918 basis, they said, would put as much life into the corn belt as the recent jump in cotton prices has put into the cotton states.

USE MORE PAINT AND SAVE MONEY

Unsightly farm buildings and farm machinery can be given longer life and beautified by a frequent use of paint. This is no news to you, you say. However there are thousands of dollars lost every year by farmers who neglect this very important task.

It is not an unusual sight to see the outbuildings and machinery on many otherwise well farmed and well kept places neglected, when a few dollars worth of paint applied in t'me will save the owner many dollars, besides beautifying the place.

With many farmers the idea seems to prevail that paint is a beautifier only. They do not stop to consider that aside from this it is sanitary and a prolonger of life to the machine or the building to which it is applied.

As much of the work of painting can be done at odd times and it certa'nly pays to apply a little paint where it is needed and when it is needed.

REAL BARBER WAR ON AT HAMPTON

Chronicle: Hampton has a real barber war, the first time the barbers of this place have come down to their places of business with bowie knives up their sleeves ready to cut prices to the last hair. If the war keeps up another week patrons will be pa'd for allowing themselves to be shaved instead of having to pay the bill themselves.

Howard, South Dakota, sent out dispatches this week that on account of a barber war there barber prices were probably the lowest in the country, with shaves at fifteen cents and hair cuts at thirty-five cents. Hampton can go them one better. In Hampton shaves are fifteen cents and hair cuts twenty-five cents.

It all came about as a result of one shop dropping the price from twenty-five cents for shaves and thirty-five cents for ha'r cuts and to twenty cents for shaves and forty cents for hair cuts. After a time the other shops dropped to the same price. Then the first shop to make the cut announced a price of fifteen cents for shaves and thirty-five cents for hair cuts. The other shops then got into the game again last Saturday morning shaves were still selling at fifteen cents, but hair cut had been on the bargain counter at twenty-five cents. It is reported that the shop which started the cut originally did not meet the last cut of the other three shops, and is still selling hair cuts at thirty-five cents.

Patrons of the shops are enjoying the scrap, and the general opinion is that if the prices are fixed at twenty cents for shaves and thirty-five cents for hair cuts it will not be far from what will be fair to the barbers as well as to their patrons.

QUEER ACCIDENT ACCURS AT HAMPTON

Recorder: Frank Bentz met with a painful and near fatal accident last Saturday evening. Mr. Bentz was in an unconconscious state for a short time and it is feared that he had sustained injuries that would prove fatal. DISTRICT COURT NEWS until the second Monday of the term.

Pearl Nelson of Dows plead guilty to manufacturing intoxicating liquors contrary to law and the court imposed a fine of $200, which defendant paid.

The grand jury organized Monday for the October term by selecting the first named as foreman: T. A. Davenport, Belmond; R. H. Lester, Goldfield; A. N. Rolfe, Eagle Grove; Ole Melhus, Clarion; O. G. Christianson, Kanawha; F. M. Meyers, Rowan; John Soren, Clarion; J. C. Brown, clerk; Fred Borel, bailiff; D. W. Stewart, court room bailiff.

Prediction Proves True

The late Bert Fisher, sheriff of this county, who had a leading part in the capture of a quantity of shoes and coats at Fort Dodge, that had been stolen by robbers from the Geo. Wheeler store at Woolstock and from Charlson & Holt at Goldfield made the prediction at the time bonds were secured that defendant would never appear for trail.

The Fort Dodge Messenger gives the latest developments in the case as follows:

Appearance bonds of $3,000 of H. W. Selicovitz were forfeited in district court last week when he failed to appear when the case of the state of Iowa vs. him was called for trail by Judge E. M. McCall. Bond was fixed at $1,500 on two counts following his indictment on Jan. 11 of this year for receiving stolen property.

Following the forfeiture of the bonds, Judge McCall ordered that a bench warrant be issued immediately for the arrest of Selicovitz and that he be brought into court for the failing to appear for trail.

Forfeiture of the bonds and the issuing of a bench warrant for the arrest of Selicovitz came after Judge McCall had refused to continue the case over until the next term of court and overruled amotion of the defense asking continuance.

Selicovitz was arrested last fall when goods were stolen from a store. Selicovitz after his arrest stated that the goods were bought by him after being told by the men who had the goods that they were from their store in Minnesota.

His case was set for trail at the March term of court, but on a motion filed by his attorneys a continuance of the case was granted until the August term because of the illness of Mrs. Selicovitz.

A motion filed Saturday by attorneys for Selicovitz again asked for a continuance of the case on the grounds that Mrs. Selicovitz, a material witness for the defense, was confined to her bed by illness and would be unable to appear at the trial. Attached to the motion was the affidavit of a Dr. Morris Simpson of Kansas City stating that Mrs. Selicovitz was under his care and that he considered a railway trip to Ft. Dodge in her present condition very injurious to her health.

Arguments to the motion were heard by Judge McCall late yesterday afternoon. Arguments for the state and defense were practically completed when a messenger boy appeared at the door of the court room. Judge McCall looked and the attorneyss did likewise.

A telegram brought by the messenger boy was turned over to the bailiff and then given to County Attorney V. E. Gabrielson. Gabrielson opened it and a smile came over his face. He handed it to B. B. Burnquist, who was assisting him in the case and a smile it up his face as he handed the message to the court.

The telegram received from the chief of police at Kansas City read:

Cousty Attorney, Ft. Dodge, Ia: Selicovitz out of city now. Wife is not sick. She made a trip to Luce Truck company Saturday. His standing is not good. Delay caused by not being able to get information Saturday. I. B. Walstos, Chief of Police.

Judge McCall then adjourned court went to his chambers, smoked half a cigar, and then returned and announced that the motion for a continuance of the case would be overruled. The case was then set for 9 o'clock this morning. Subpoenaes were turned over to the hands of the sheriff's office and rounding up of witnesses continued until 11 o'clock last night.

When the case was called for trial this morning attorneys for the defendant, who was in the city yesterday, had disappeared during the night without their knowledge.

First Lecture Course Number Held Tonight

Cartoonist First Number On Program Is Reported As One Of The Best

BOOST FOR LOCAL SCHOOL

Alton Packard, America's greatest platform cartoonist-humorist gives us an evening of "fun well done."

Several Belmond people have seen Mr. Packard at work and recommend him highly. Mr. Packard, before going on the lecture platform, was a cartoonist in one of the leading newspapers of the East. His cartoons are interspersed with both instrumental and vocal music.

Don't miss the first number. If you haven't received your season ticket, buy it at the door. $1.50 for four numbers.

Our boys went to Thornton last Friday and had no trouble defeating the Thornton high school team. Madsen held the Thornton team at bay without much effort, allowing only one man to cross the plate.

Report cards were given out this week, and as a result there are many happy, but also a few sad students. Parents are asked to examine the report cards, and in case a child has a low grade or a failure grade to find out the cause.

Co-operation with the teacher will help a great deal to remove the cause and bring the grade up to standard.

The state inspector of vacational Agricultural schools spent last Thursday inspecting the local school and the work done by Mr. Christie.

A very interesting program was given by the literary soiety last Friday afternoon. The patrons and friends of the school are always welcome.

N. M. WOLCOTT WRITES OF OIL DEVELOPEMENTS

In a recent letter from N. M. Wolcott of Des Moines he tells of further developements is the oil sensation in South Dakota and North Dakota. He writes in part:

"The oil drilling company started the drilling on Oct. 1 six miles southwest of Lemmon and they had a crowd of about 5,000 people and the womens clubs and commercial clubs and business men donated the food and gave everyone a free lunch. The oil company made a contract with the drilling company for three wells and they are now drilling on the first one and the second has been located one and one-half miles northeast of Lemmon in Adams county, North Dakota, and the third one will not be located until next spring, and that is the one that I am looking for."

If there is any oil found, the many friends of Mr Wolcott will all hope that it is struck on or near the land owned by him.

SURPRISE PARTY

Last week Wednesday evening a complete surprise was held on Ike Shaffer and Gus Larson, when some twenty-five of their friends and neighbors surprised them with a party at the Shaffer home. Will Baldridge and family from Cedar Rapids were present for the occasion, and Will took the two men out for a ride, and when they returned they found the house full. A most delightful evening was spent in helping the men celebrate their birthdays, and delicious refreshments were served by the Mesdams Shaffer, Larson and Julius Bingman. The out of town guests were Mr. and Mrs. Will Baldridge of Cedar Rapids and Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Baldridge of Kanawha.

Yes, we know a man in this town who reads his bible every day. He's a preacher.

WRIGHT COUNTY INSTITUTE GOES THRU NICELY

Monitor: The Wright county institute opened Thursday morning at 9:15 with two delightful solos by Mrs. Fickle assisted by Mrs. Atherton on the cello and Miss Hilton at the piano. Her first number was "Lassie O' Mine." Following the musical number Mr. Roadman of Fayette gave a talk to the entire meeting. He gave his subject as "The Problems of Play," or "Some Fun." He called attention to the fact few realize that nine-tenths of a child's time from one to 21 is spent in play. Because of this play is one of the most important factors in the life of the child. We have too long emphasized the harmful side and neglected the helpful side of play. A great sociologist interested in prisoners discovered that nine-tenths of the men behind the bars had never had a pet. There are three parts of the play program which should interest the teacher. Play of the home, of the community, and play of the school. The pupil spends only one-tenth of his time in school and while school play is important it has but a small part in the life of the pupil. He gives it to the teacher the task not only of directing the play of the school but of helping in the play of the home and community. Mr. Roadman holds that a boy's waywardness is often due to the fact that the father does not play and work with him. He also warns against commercializing community play. He thinks that if we would take the movies, pool halls and dance halls out of the money making business we would reform them at once.

After Mr. Roadman's talk the meeting was divided into sections.

Mr. Moffatt took charge of the high school section He spoke of the work of getting high school pupils interested in poetry

Miss Schuneman of Cedar Falls talked to the rural teachers on hand and art work. She feels that the teachers do too much of the work. She suggests that the teachers should get the child to make the suggestions. She illustrated her work by telling the teachers how to build a house from boxes. The work on the house could assist in the work in arithmetic, art work, sanitation, hand work and coloring.

Mr. Barnes spoke to the intermediate and upper grades upon the work of interesting pupils in literature.

Miss Shields talked to the primary teachers on reading in the primary grades.

At 11 o'clock there was a change in instructors for the different divisions. In the afternoon the meeting opened with two selections by the quartette. Their first number was the sextet from Lucia. After this Mr. Roadman spoke very strongly for the Iowa State Teachers association. The general meeting of this is to be held in Des Moines on Nov. 3, 4, 5.

Misses Grenoble and Curtis assisted in the high school round table which was presided over by Mr. Moffett. Miss Grenoble's suggestions for "Better Speech Week" were interesting and should be very effective in improving language work. An interesting talk on high school civics was given by Miss Curtis.

The grade round table in which Mr Barnes of Cedar Falls was chairman, took up the problem of the "non-reasoning pupil in arethmetic." led by Miss Jacobs, of "technical grammar in the elementary school." by Miss Thomas and of "silent reading," led by Mr. Barnes.

Supt. Bock and deputy Aagaard were busy women during the institute sessions, attending to the many details which make for success in such a gathering. They are to be complimented on the result achieved.

CANDIDATES LINING UP FOR SUPERVISOR

The Independent is informed that John Baker may be a candidate for the office of supervisor of the first district of Wright county, which takes in the townships of Belmond, Pleasant and Iowa. The Independent is also informed that a local man may make a try for the office on the democratic ticket, so that it looks like politics was beginning to warm up somewhat in this section.

COMMUNITY WELFARE CLUB MEETING

The regular meeting of the Community Welfare club will be held on next week Friday, October 28th., in the library basement.

The meeting will be in charge of Mrs. A. E. Martin who will give a demonstration on the making of dress forms.

Five of these forms will be made that afternoon. It is hoped that every woman in the community will plan to attend this meeting for it will be well worth attending. Every woman can afford one of these dress forms as the cost of one is less than a dollar. And she can make all of her own clothes to fit perfectly.

Mrs. Tom Brooks, Mrs. Hardwick, Mrs. W. A. Martin and others who have one of these forms are much pleased with them and recommend them very highly.

Belmond Banker to Northwood.

A. S. Lund, formerly of Mason City and Belmond, has closed a deal where he has purchased an interest and accepted the position of the cashier in the First National bank here. He began his new duties Saturday. Lund has several years banking experience behind him. Ten years ago he came to Mason City and was connected with the firm of Schanke & co., for six years, three of which he was cashier.

After his return from the army, where he was granted a commission in the Finance branch, he purchased an interest of the First National of Belmond where he served as cashier for two years. Resigning his position he took up the study of business law at the University of Minnesota. During the past summer he has been at his cottage at Clear Lake. Mr. and Mrs. Lund arrived the middle of last week.

JUDGE McCALL GIVES BERG FIVE YEARS

Lawyer Makes Plea For Mercy And Judge Gives Ex-cashier Limit

PLANS MADE FOR PAROLE

Many Friends Of Accused Man Hope To Secure His Freedom By Parole

(From the Monitor.)

The court room was filled with spectators yesterday when John Berg, defaulting cashier of the Belmond State bank, received his sentence. Attorney Files of Fort Dodge made an eloquent plea for the defendant—reviewing his twenty year connection with the bank, his high standing among the people of Belmond, grief over his wife's accidental death, the land boom, his speculations, the collapse of the boom, Berg's taking of the bank's money and his repentant attitude in turning over to the bank his land holdings—12,000 acres of Montana land, two Minnesota farms and a like number in this state, besides his personal property, even his diamond ring. His whole plea was one for clemency.

County Attorney Rogers' remarks were brief. Berg had been indicted by the grand jury and as defendant had plead guilty to the charge. He argued that the law should be enforced against his as against the most humble citizen.

Judge McCall stated that the laws of Iowa imposed a five year sentence for larceny and that he had no discretion in the matter. The court thought no censure on his part necessary, that five years at Fort Madison would be enough.

Friends of Berg are hoping the board of parole will deal leniently with him and with credit for good behavior they may be able to secure his release in from twelve to eighteen months.

Berg made a big mistake in taking the bank's money in the first place, but he made a bigger one when, after he was found to be short $42,000 and allowed to retain his connection with the bank, he continued his defalcations at the expense of those who were shielding him.

Garner Investment Co. vs. E. A. Patton and Gibford Chemical Co., suit on note. Jury returned verdict in favor of the defendant E. A. Patton and against the Gibford Chemical Co., for $2,637.70. The Investment company claimed to have purchased the Patton notes from the chemical company for a valuable consideration, etc. Patton admitted signing the notes in question but says the chemical company was to retain them in their possession; that he, Patton, was to act as their agent in selling stock food and apply the sales made on the notes in question; that said company failed to fill orders for stock food and otherwise deceived the plaintiff, and by reason of said fraud secured his signature. The jury took the same view of the matter.

At the February 1921, term of the district court Patrick Brennen of Eagle Grove obtained judgment against W. N. and Catherine Wood for malicious prosecution in the sum of $250 and $161 costs. FREE AIR!

(The Air has been pretty well blown out the past few weeks, owing to too much other labor. And if you don't think that the Air is real hard work, try it. We'll give you one big round dollar to prove it. Howsomever, be that as it may, nevertheless and to the contrary nothwithstanding, the following spasm was submitted free gratis fer nuthin, and it costs you the same. If you don't like it, send us a better one.)

In our weekly travels we notice many things which bring us a smile. Maybe we make you smile, who knows?

One day last week we noticed a sign in a barber shop window which read "Shaving while you wait." A good sign, doubtless, for such a firm, but we wondered whether in the old days the men left their faces at that place to be shaved and then called in later to get the map after the lawn had been mowed?

We presume you noticed the various signs about last week, reading "Up in the Air." We presumed it was the name of the show, but say lissen, when Saturday came and we got a look at the show girls, we saw what "Up in the Air" meant. It meant their skirts.

We don't know whether the show was up in the air or not, because we didn't go, because we didn't have a comp, which is simple and easily understood. And beefsteak is still on the decline.

Sitting on the plaza of the local hotel we overheard a man and woman talking. She says to him: "What do you think of the Ouija board." And he says "Why, really, I never have taken any meals there.

Out at the ball park last summer we heard a Kanawha lady say "Oh isn't our pitcher wonderful! Just look, he hits those fellow's bats no matter where they place them."

A man we know who has quite a few clerks was talking the other day about reducing the number. Said we: "How many work in your store?" He replied "Oh, probably about half of 'em."

Have you ever noticed that the only place where one head is better than two is in a barrel?

We wonder if, when a certain young fellow in town talks to his best girl like this: "There is something hesitating on my lips," if he means that misplaced eyebrow struggling on his upper lip?

People ought to take more interest in their children's daily lives and understand more of what they are doing, what they say and mean. We were invited out to supper the other night (this was just plain folks, so it was supper, not dinner) and the lady of the house was talking to her innocent young son, saying "Now, H— don't ever let me hear of you shooting craps again; the poor things have as much right to live as we have."

CLARION FARMER BATTLES WITH MAD STEER

Nels Nelson was assisting Adam Seifert in driving some cattle he had purchased yesterday to the Great Western stock yards, the Monitor in yesterday's issue says. The steer, which had a reputation for being fractious, took a tantrum opposite the W. H. Milnes residence and charged Mr. Seifert's team. Nelson sprang to protect the team and became the steer's target. He seized the animal by the horns but was thrown to the ground. He recovered himself but was swiftly attacked again. This time he threw his arms around the animal's neck. The now infuriated steer braced itself for another attempt to gore its victim when its hind hoofs slipped on the cement pavement and it received a serious injury, for it staggered a block up the street and lay down in front of the Henry Thomas home, where it died a half hour later.

Mr. Nelson was examined by a physician who found no injuries but a twisted rib and some severe bruises, certainly a lucky escape.

Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

IOWA PRESS ASSOCIATION

ADVERTISING SPACE
(From the Bryon, Calif., Times)

The Red Bluff Daily News submits this statement: "If you had newspaper space to sell, and a payroll to meet, would you sell your space to business men who want it or would you hold it for local people who won't take it and who sometimes declare advertising doesn't pay?"

The question is one that concerns newspaper editors everywhere. It many places notably smaller communities, the newspaper has a hard struggle for existance. It may be a live sheet, splendidly edited, but the local merchant feels that "everybody knows him" and it is not necessary to advertise; that he does about the same amount of business anyway.

He fails to appreciate what it means to his community to spread the news abroad of its doings, of its achievement, and its opportunities for new settlers.

Every new family means at least $1,000 yearly spent in that community. Every merchant gets his share of this.

In supporting the newspaper by advertising, the merchant encourages enterprise on the part of the publisher, and the greater the publicity given the town and the district the more rapid the growth.

The local newspaper is the chamber of commerce and publicity bureau combined. It should have the support of every one, to the end that the greatest amount of good may be accomplished.

Thousands of dollars worth of free advertising is given every year to the community by the local newspaper. Every little thing is boosted and the people abroad begin to find out what a fine place your town is.

Only in advertising can the local newspaper find reward for its effort. The subscriptions do not more than pay the cost of publishing and delivering paper.

In supporting the paper by advertising the merchant is contributing not only to his direct benefit, but to the future of the community.

Naturally, if there is not sufficient income for local sources to pay the bills, and leave a fair margin of profit, there can be no question of the justification of the newspaper accepting advertising from abroad.

The people of Bryon, for instance, would not have the Broyn Times for another issue if it were not for outside advertising. The fact that this advertising space is in demand by outsiders is a tribute to the paper—to it influence and its wide circulation.

The Red Bluff News wisely says that "newspaper space is not for handpicked customers, any more than is the commodity of any other business. And all other business sells its wares where it can find a customer.

WHY WORRY?

If there is any one thing that is not going to get you anywhere, it is worrying.

Just now especially. To stew and fret and fume and worry will not make money any easier nor bring in any coin to pay that overdue note or the past due taxes. A little hustling and more elbow grease combined in equal measure with better saving in times of plenty would have been the way of keeping the wrinkles from you now. But as long as you didn't, why the satme treatment right now will do wonders.

Everybody is in the same boat in regards to paying their debts. It is and has been and probably will be for awhile longer, a case of each one stand off the next fellow, until things get back to somewhere near normal and people can get something for what they raise and do. There is no use of worrying about it; that won't help.

IS MONEY LOOSENING UP?

They say it is, that the coin of the realm is beginning to flow a little swifter than it has the past few or rather many months. The small cash seems to be coming easier, altho it is still pretty tight, and the big money is not yet in sight. It is the belief of those in a place to know the most about it, that the money situation is somewhat easier. But the times will never get back anywher to normal until the price of the farmers' products comes within a range where he can raise his product at a decent, living profit. Until then the farmer is not going to be in a position to do much of any buying or improving. Agriculture is the foundation of all business, and when the foundation is insecure then the whole structure is unstable and apt to fall.

The entire country is waiting for an explanation of why the finished product is still high, and the raw material way down in price. Twenty cent corn and 14 cent oats do not mean anything nowadays except that the man who raises them and has the grain to sell is stung; if he depends on his crops for his living and his pleasure of life then he hasn't very much of either.

The money situation may loosen up and it is to be hoped that it will, but the farmer, the foundation of the country, the basis of the nation's prosperity, is not going to benefit very much until he gets decent prices for what he has to sell. And until the farmer benefits no one is going to benefit much. Upon his successful business depends the succeful business of the rest of the country.

A SIMPLE OIL SHAMPOO

Are you having trouble with your hair splitting at the ends, coming out "by the handful," looking dead and lifeless? Next time you shampoo your hair apply ordianary olive oil, hot, to the roots of your hair with a bit of cotton or a little brush. Leave it in over night and then the next day be very carful that you use enough sudsings and rinsings to get the oil out again, This method of stimulating the hair is approved by the best hair dressers.

When we hear a fellow boasting that he never changes his mind we quite agree with him. It is difficult to change something that does not exist.

Do You Believe Our Advertising?

Solely for the benefit of our out of town trade, last week and five weeks ago, we advertised some very special values. The advertisements reached only out of town trade and was not seen by Mason City readers. We got a very poor response and few out of town shoppers benefitted. Had these items been advertised to our City patrons, the merchandise would have all been sold in one day, perhaps less. We want you to know that when we say we are giving an extra good value, that it really is extra value.

EASY NOW TO GET 25 MILES TO THE GALLON OF "GAS"

Kansas City Chemist Makes Amazing Discovery—Doubles Gasoline Mileage—Removes Carbon Iinstantly—Is Harmless—Makes Generous Trial Offer.

Any car owner can easily double his mileage on gasoline and be rid of carbon forever through the remarkable discovery of a Kansas City chemist. You simply put a little of this chemicalized oil in your gasoline and immediately you will notice a marked increase in your power. Your car will go whizzing up hills on high that you formerly had difficulty in making on second. The product is absolutely harmless.

Inside of ten minute after you add this mixture to your "gas" the carbon in your cyclinders will commence to dissolve and be blown out the exhaust. After a few days' use even cylinders that pumped oil and fouled spark plugs will be dry and clean as a whistle.

This remarkable discovery is called "slicker oil." Exhaustive tests over a long period of time show that it will increase your gasoline mileage from one-fourth to one-half and reduce your upkeep enough to save the cost of a car in three or four years.

To introduce this wonderful discovery the manufacturers will send anyone a large $1.50 can for only $1, with the understanding that it costs nothing if not satisfactory.

SEND NO MONEY. Merely your name and address on a card or letter to the Slicker Oil Co., 100 Gateway Station, Kansas City, Mo., will bring the large trial can by return mail. When it arrives merely pay the postman $1 and postage. Try the oil. If it doesn't rid our car of carbon and give you 25 percent to 50 percent more mileage your money will be returned and the "Slicker Oil" will cost you nothing. Write at once as this offer is fully garanteed. Advt.

TRAGEDY RECIPE

Take one reckless, natural born fool.

Two or three drinks of bad liquor.

A fast high-powered motor car.

Soak the fool well in the liquor place in the car and let him go. After due time, remove the wreckage, place in black satin lined box and garnish with flowers.

If you don't like your neighbor and want him to move, begin telling your troubles to him each day. He'll soon get enough.

Look into the home life of the fellow who claims that nothing ever worries him. Possibly his wife is earning the living.

HUNTERS ARE FIGHTING FOR THEIR RIGHTS

Wall Lake a a hunting resort is again receiving attention according to the Des Moines Register which says the state executive council held an all day meeting Saturday to confer with the conservation commission over state park policies and hear two delegations of citizens interested in park propositions at Wall Lake, Wright county, and North Twin Lake in Calhoun county.

The Wall Lake delegation revealed to the council a situation which has resulted in a monopoly of the lake privileges by a few land owners residing in Waterloo, who own all approaches to the lake and are making alleged exorbitant charges for the privilege of hunting or fishing.

It is claimed that this organization recently delivered an ultimatum to the Webster City Hunting club in which the club was asked to pay one thousand dollars for a lease to a 30 by 130 foot lot on which their hunting shack is located. Failure to submit to these terms it is said, would result in the arrest of the twenty members of the club if they attempted to reach their shack in boats.

Prices charged parties desiring to fish in the lake are said to be $1 a person for crossing the land of the monopolists; $2 for a scow for one day and $4 a day for the privilege of pitching a tent.

The hunting club is asking the executive council to condemn and purchase an approach to the lake in order that hunters and lovers of outdoor life can enjoy the privileges of this 1,000 acres of water, and the club has raised by popular subscription $2,700 which will be contributed for this purpose. The council took no action on the proposition—Monitor.

A COUNTY AGENT

The county commissioners of Perkins county are to be congratulated upon their action in passing a resolution which provides for the employment of a county agent. This is one of the most progressive moves that have been made by the commissioners.

A county agent is as necessary to a farming community as a business manager is to a business organization. He is the man upon whom the American Farm Bureau Federation places the responsibility of bringing about better organization among the producers of the country, and the man to whom the farmer looks for aid in his marketing problems.

In former years a county agent was looked upon as a man who told the farmer how to farm and, as a natural result, a county agent was not looked upon with favor by farmers who had spent years in successful farming. In later years the duties of the county agent have become to be a reality what the name implies—the agent of the farmers of the county. He aids them in marketing their products; he watches the weather reports and keeps in touch with crop conditions; he assists in the extermination of crop destroying insects; he watches for diseases among livestock asd assists in the prevention of contagious and fatal diseases among stock; and in numerous other ways uses his knowledge to better conditions in the county where he is employed.—Lemmon, S. D., Tribune.

A full dinner was served, the delegates bringing sandwiches and cake, and the hostesses, furnishing the remainder of the feast. The leading address of the day was a talk by Mrs. O. M. Olson of Ft. Dodge who gave a travel talk.

BUSINESS IS BUSINESS

By Berton Braley.

"Business is Business," the little Man said,
"A battle where 'everything goes,'
Where the only gospel is 'get ahead'
And never spare friends or foes,
'Slay or be slain,' is the slogan cold.
You must struggle and slash and tear,
For Business is Business, a fight for gold,
Where all that you do is fair"
[illegible]
"Business is Business," the Big Man said,
"A battle to make of earth
A place to yield more wine and bread,
More pleasure and joy and mirth;
There are still some bandits and buccaneers,
Who are jungle-bred beasts of trade,
But their number dwindles with passing years
And dead is the code they made!"
"Business is Business" the Big Man said,
"But it's something that's more, far more;
For it makes sweet gardens of deserts dead,
And cities it built now roar
Where once the deer and gray wolf ran
From the pioneer's swift advance;
Business is Magic that toils for man
Business is True Romance."

"And those who make it a ruthless fight
Have only themselves to blame
If they feel no whit of the keen delight
In playing the Bigger Game,
The game that calls on the heart and head
The best of man's strength and nerve;
'Business is Business,' the Big Man said,
'And that Business is to serve!"

Lard for Sale.—Sheriff Bros. 1t*

What the Independent claims is a record, regardless of territory, is the one made by C. N. Hildebrand with his Ford. "Connor" has a Ford touring car, and in the past two years he has driven the car something like fifteen thousand miles. On one of the wheels is the original casing that he had on the car when purchased. He has never had a blow-out or a puncture on that tire, and has never had the casing off the rim, so that he has driven fifteen thousand miles or better on the same tube. If anyone can beat fifteen thousand miles on a tube we would like to hear about it, for we believe this is a record. Any motorist who gets that many miles from a tube, to say nothing of the casing, is certainly getting the worth of his money. C. N. has driven his car over all kinds of roads, from pavement to crushed rock and rough dirt, in all parts of the state. The tire is a Goodrich, and "Connor" says he presumes the tube is too, but he never had it out so doesn't know for certain. Anybody that can equal or beat that record? Let's hear about it then.

Mrs. Lowenberg of Goodell was in the city one day last week, visiting friends and attending to business affairs.

Do you want a job on the farm? If you do, for the luva Mike tell us! Last week the Independent said something about having applicants for a job, and before the ink had hardly dried on the paper the flood of farmers began coming in, calling up and otherwise inquiring for help. If you want a job on the farm, tell us; we can place half a dozen men right now, picking corn, at from three to four—all that the job is worth and more than the farmer can really afford to pay with his corn selling at less than thirty cents—and your eats. The big trouble seems to be that the idle labor does not want to work at the corn picking job at the prices offered, but nobody is going to offer more, and a job is a job now, regardless. We also have a place for a man and wife, or for a girl who can take care of children, on the farm.

MEMBERSHIP DRIVE IS SUCCESSFUL

Altho reports have not been received from all townships as yet, all indications seem to point towards a successful drive on last Wednesday, October 12.

The membership campaign was interrupted to a great extent by the husking season which arrived about two weeks earlier this year. In an ordinary season corn husking would not have been started before Oct. 12.

The campaign was carried forward by the chairman and his cooperators in each township and an effort was made to solicit personally each man who had not already cast his lot with the local farm bureau. Reports will be given later as to the increase in membership in Wright county and in the state as a whole.

SELECT SEED CORN ENOUGH FOR NEXT TWO YEARS

"The proper time to save seed corn is when there is a plentiful supply of good seed," states Ralph E. Johnston, extension agronomist at the South Dakota State college. "The wise corn grower, who has had years of experience in South Dakota, will select corn enough this fall for his total 1922 and 1923 corn acreages.

"When the corn crop is good it is well to save out of the abundance against the time when it may be poor. By proper methods of storage, seed corn selected this fall can be kept until spring of 1923 with every reason to expect it is to have a good germination at that time.

"Because of the favorable season and the late growing period, many of the corn ears this fall are too large for seed. These should be avoided and only the well matured, well filled ears of the standard length and diameter should be selected."

HAMPTON LEGION HAS 40 AND 8 DAY

Recorder: Despite inclement weather members of the American Legion were out in full force Friday afternoon ready to take the secret work of a side degree which has been christened "La Societe Des 40 Hommes et 8 Chevaux."

The day's program started promptly at 1 o'clock when 59 candidates presented themselves for membership at the "dug out" located in the club room of the Memorial hall where they were immediately branded on the forehead and cheeks and escorted to the county jail where they were temporarily incarcerated after which they were marched back to the "dug out" and put thru a series of calisthenics. This procedure was followed by the officers in charge stationing the candidates at various locations in the business district of the city where they were put to work sweeping the pavement, riding brooms, jig dancing and various other stunts and antics well known to army life.

The street parade, headed by the Hampton municipal band, was staged at 3 o'clock after which the secret work of the order was given, State Chaplin T. L. Roberts of Sheffield acting in the capacity of master of ceremonies, and here the pilgrims after having been duly obligated, elevated and humilated and in possession of the secret work, were declared full fledged members of the "40 and 8'ers.'

At 6 o'clock a sumptuous "chow" was served by the ladies of the American Legion Auxiliary at the Knights of Pythias dining room in the Winsdor building, which was greatly enjoyed by the boys. At 8:30 o'clock the large ball room at Hotel Coonley was thrown open to members of the American Legion and their ladies, and dancing to music furnished by Leache's orchestra of Ackley was the diversion until a late hour when all left for home declaring that they had the time of their lives.

The day's proceedings, which in spots might be termed hilarious, was attended by orderly conduct and in every way creditable to the American Legion. The boys were out for a good time and they had it.

The third park site is one of 190 acres near Eldora where the city of Eldora has raised $16,000 for the building of a dam at the mouth of a natural lake bed. When completed the park will have a 60-acre lake all the way from 10 to 20 feet deep surrounded by bluffs and with a wooded island in the center.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

CHAPTER VI.—To get proper surgical aid, John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Dale convey "Babe," unconscious, to the city. Doctors assure them she is not seriously hurt. Dale meets an old friend, Bobby McLaurin, who had married Patricia Clavering. Telling his father of David Moreland's coal, the old gentleman's actions convince his son of his father's guilt in the killing of Moreland.

CHAPTER VII.—It is arranged that "Babe" is to stay with Mrs. McLaurin to be educated. Dale, refusing his father's proffered financial aid to develop the mine, interests Newton Wheatley, capitalist, who agrees to furnish the money. Dale realizes he loves "Babe."

CHAPTER VIII. — Returning to the Halfway Switch, Dale meets Major Bradley, lawyer, and real friend of the mountaineers, whom he engages as counsel for the company. A man named Goff, of evil repute, tries to bribe Dale to betray the Morelands by selling him the coal deposits, and telling them they are of little value. Dale attempts to thrash him, but Goff draws a revolver. Dale is unarmed.

CHAPTER IX.—Goff enlists the aid of a turbulent crowd, the Balls and Torreys, to make trouble for Dale's company. The Littlefords and Morelands agree to forget the old feud and dwell in harmony.

CHAPTER X.—"Babe" returns to her home, fearing she is a burden to the McLaurins. Dale remonstrates, and she agrees to go back, for the sake of an education. Waylaid by "Black Adam" Ball, Dale fights a pistol duel with the desperado, and Ball is killed. Dale is arrested and taken to jail at Cartersville. He doesn't see how his shot could have killed Ball.

Dale dropped his weapon. He went as white as death, and his two hands clutched uncertainly at his throat. He was a murderer! No, he wasn't—his bullet had gone wild; it had struck Ball's head on the other side of the tree, by accident. But how could he prove that it had been an accident? Would any jury believe him? It was far from probable.

He stepped from behind the hemlock and went toward the writhing Goliath, whose legs only were visible now.

Then a third shot rang out on the morning stillness. It had been fired from a point some little distance away, and Dale's condition of mind at the moment was such that he didn't even note the direction from which the sound had come. He was unhurt, and he had not heard the whine of a bullet or the pattering of shot on the leaves. When he looked about him, he saw no one; neither did he see any telltale smoke. Perhaps, he thought dimly, it had been a squirrel-hunter that had fired that shot. He forgot about it very quickly for the time being, and went on toward Adam Ball, who now was lying perfectly still.

There was a bullet-hole through and through the great, shaggy head. The face behind the short, curly black beard was of the colorless hue of soapstone. The giant hillman was dead.

Bill Dale knelt there beside Black Adam. Again he clutched at his throat with his two shaking hands, and this time he tore his blue flannel shirt. All the agony and all the remorse in the universe seemed to be gathering there in his heart. Never before had he seen death. Its grim presence terrified him. That the deplorable thing had been an accident, due to his faulty marksmanship, mattered little. He had killed a man, and the blood-red brand of Cain was burning away on his brow; he was a man in a hell of his own making. And kneeling there Bill Dale sobbed a great sob that shook his broad shoulders as a violent ague would have shaken them.

He tried to look at the blue-edged hole in the shaggy head; at the cruel, brutish face that was of the colorless hue of soapstone. Merciful tears blinded him, and he couldn't see. It was a compensation, a pitifully beautiful compensation. . . .

Five minutes passed, five minutes that were as five years to this man who had never been in the presence of death before. Then he realized that he was being surrounded by kinsmen of the dead mountaineer. He looked up into their ashen, angry faces, and they cursed him. Big and gripping brown hands were placed upon him; several rifles were turned upon him. He arose and spread out his arms, and offered his breast to the frowning muzzles. They could give him, at least, oblivion.

"Shoot, if you like," he said bitterly.

"Shoot, If You Like!" He Said Bitterly.

"It was an accident, y'know, but—shoot, if you like."

"No," commanded Adam Ball's father, a slender and angular old man with a straggling iron-gray beard—"No, don't shoot. Shootin's too quick, by gonnies. And 'en, it ain't accordin' to law." (Queer how suddenly he respected the majesty of the law!) "We'd a durned sight ruther see him hung by the neck ontel dead in the jailyard at Cartersville. Ye'uns put down them thar guns. Put down all o' them thar guns right now; hear me?"

He turned back to Dale. "Ye say it was a accident?" he sneered.

"Yes, it was an accident."

"Like the old devil!" roared Black Adam's father.

He stopped and picked up his son's black slouch hat and examined it. There were two bullet holes close together in the rim—and one of them had been there for a long time.

"John Moreland, he's been a-l'arnin' ye how to shoot," he said, "and you've shore l'arned purty d—d well. It must ha' been yore third shot 'at got Adam."

"I fired only once," disagreed Dale. "Your son fired first; I fired second; and somebody else, I haven't the slightest idea who, fired the other shot."

"Aw, shet up! Ye can tell it at the trial," growled old Ball. Then to his kinsmen.

"We'll hold Dale right here, boys, ontel the shuriff he's sent atter comes. And we'll not move Adam, which same is accordin' to law. I reckon Shuriff Tom Flowers'll find a different job from what he expected to find; won't he, boys? Say, I wisht one o' you fellers'd gi' me a good, big chaw o' tobacker. Be durned ef I don't. Adam's death, it has made me feel sort o' bad, by gonnies, and tobacker's allus a consolation—

"Bill Dale, you hain't got a chaw o' tobacker on ye, have ye—bought tobacker, store tobacker? It's a durned sight better'n home-made, I says. Ye say ye don't chew! Chew—h—l! Whyn't ye say 'chaw,' like a man! I allus knowed ye wasn't no 'count, nohow. Nobody 'at don't chaw tobacker ain't no 'count. . . . All right, Jim Ike," to his nephew, "I'll take a chaw o' yores, then. And I'll take a tol'ably big chaw, Jim Ike, 'cause Adam's death has made me feel sort o' bad, and tobacker's allus a consolation."

The sounds of the shooting had carried far, and it wasn't long until the scene of the tragedy was crowded with Balls and Torreys, Littlefords and Morelands. Major Bradley and Hayes, too, were there. Every man of them was armed; a very little thing might easily turn the place into a shambles. The major saw this, and he was afraid. He drew the leaders of the Morelands and the Littlefords aside, and finally prevailed upon them to do their utmost toward keeping peace until the coming of the sheriff.

At first John Moreland and Ben Littleford were for taking Bill Dale from the Balls and Torreys who guarded him, if they had to depopulate the whole Ball settlement, Jerusalem Cove and Hatton's Hell to accomplish it! Happily, the major's counsel prevailed.

Sheriff Tom Flowers was a tall and lithe, smooth-faced man. He arrived with Luke Moreland at noon, after hours of hard riding. He saw the high tension, and immediately steeled himself to handle the situation. After riding straight to the center of the gathering and there halting his horse, he said evenly:

"In order that I may know who to arrest, I must know something of the circumstances. Only one man must speak at a time. No playing bad with me; and remember that, gentlemen. I'll certainly drop the fellow who starts playing hoss with me, if it's the last move I make on earth. Now somebody gently use his powers of speech."

Major Bradley, more soldierlike than ever, went forward. "As the attorney of Mr. Dale, who stands accused of killing Adam Ball," he said to the officer, "I beg leave to state that my client will do no talking at present."

Dale understood, and he did not open his mouth.

But old Ball had something to say, and he proceeded to say it:

"He killed my son, Adam," pointing to Dale, "in cold blood. Me and about a dozen o' my kin was on our way over Long ridge to look at a bee tree, when we heered three pistol shots. We was right up thar," pointing to the northward, "and we come a-runnin' over here to see, by gonnies, what was the matter. Well, by gonnies, we found Bill Dale thar down on his knees aside o' my son, Adam, who was as dead as h—l or deader; and Bill Dale was a-sobbin' and a-sobbin' about it. And ef he never killed my son Adam, what was he a-sobbin' and a-sobbin' about, I ax you that? And my son Adam, he had a rifle, by gonnies, but he never shot none at all. He was with us up to a few minutes before, and he hadn't shot none all mornin'. Shuriff Flowers, I wisht ye'd gi' me a good, big chaw o' tobacker, by gonnies, 'cause my son Adam his death it has made me feel bad."

Major Bradley stopped caressing his well-kept gray imperial, walked over to the dead man's rifle, picked it up and put its muzzle to his nose. He scented fresh powder-smoke. Then he faced old Ball with a strange, hard glitter in his blue eyes.

"You are a liar, sir," he said with a peculiar politeness.

A stir ran quickly over the Balls and Torreys. Sheriff Flowers called out:

"Quiet, there!" and there was quiet. He continued: "Where is Mr. Dale's revolver?"

The Balls had it. They produced it. It had three empty chambers when it should have had but one!

"Pass it to me butt first," ordered the law's representative. He knew that many a man had been shot while taking a revolver barrel first, and he was taking no chances.

Old Ball obediently turned the weapon around.

"Say, sheriff," he chittered, "have ye plumb fo'got about me axin' ye fo' a chaw o' store-bought? By gonnies, Adam's death—"

Flowers turned to Dale.

"I have heard through Luke Moreland," he said with more or less of feeling in his voice, "a good many things in your favor. I want you to know that I'm sorry to have to take you and place you in the Cartersville jail. To show you that I mean it, I'll spare you the irons and allow you to ride your own horse along beside me, as though you were not under arrest at all."

Dale had by this time worn the keen edge from his grief by means of his great will power. He bowed slightly to the officer and replied with grave courtesy:

"Believe me, sir," with the very faintest trace of a smile, "I am very much obliged to you."

Luke Moreland led up the sleek young bay that Bill Dale had named Fox, and Dale swung himself easily into the saddle. He faced the sheriff.

"If you're ready to go, sir," he said, "I am."

Together they rode through the woodland toward the broad, green valley, with the Littlefords, the Morelands, Major Bradley and Hayes following closely behind them.

Up on the side of David Moreland's mountain there had been a silent and unseen witness to the arrest of Bill Dale. She was hidden behind a gnarled and twisted clump of sheep-laurel, sitting on a patch of tiny, dainty, pure blue dayflowers—crushing in her hands the tiny purple blossoms that are known as Job's tears.

"Lord, what'll I do now?" she murmured.

It was a great and unanswerable question, and it was a prayer, too.

"Lord, what'll I do now?" she repeated.

When Bill Dale had ridden out of her sight, she threw down the crushed flowers and flung herself prostrate, with her face close to the hemlock needles and the earth, and wept low and bitterly, and wept and wept—

"Lord, what'll I do now?"

CHAPTER XI

By Heck Keeps a Secret.

When Sheriff Tom Flowers and the others had been gone for half an hour, Elizabeth Littleford sat up in the silence. It was a great and heavy silence that hovered there over the north end of David Moreland's mountain. There was not even the drumming of a yellowhammer, not even the saucy chattering of a boomer squirrel, not even the twittering of a bird. Not a leaf stirred anywhere. Everything seemed lifeless. It was almost as though she were the sole inhabitant of the world.

Then she thought. It was noontime, and the officer and his prisoner would doubtless halt at John Moreland's cabin for the noonday meal; and if she hastened she would get to see Bill Dale again.

So she ran like a doe through the green woodland, through the tangle of laurel and ivy and over the moss-covered stones, across a shoulder of David Moreland's mountain. She was barefooted, and her dress was a simple garment of white-dotted blue calico, and her long brown hair flowed behind her like the hair of a young witch—because of the excitement of the morning, she had forgotten to give it its usual daily plaiting.

As she drew near to the Moreland leader's home, she saw Bill Dale and the sheriff walk out at the gateway and mount their horses. Major Bradley came out, and he, too, mounted his horse; and she was glad that he was going along. There was a great crowd; all the Littlefords were there, and all the Morelands, and old Granny Heck, the fortune-teller. On every face Babe saw signs of sympathy and sorrow. Her eyes filled. She was so glad that they, too, loved him. It was worth going to jail to know that one was loved like that! Not that it didn't hurt to see him going to jail, of course. Jail and horror are words that mean the same to the mountain dweller.

She went on to tell him good-by. She knew it would be hard, but she steeled herself; she would be a Littleford, and strong. He saw her coming, and he turned his bay horse and rode to meet her. She stopped and clasped her hands, with her arms down full length, and tried to smile at him.

"You promised me," he said gently, "that you'd go back to Patricia and finish your education."

"I keep my promises," was the quick reply, "jest like every other Littleford that ever lived kept their promises. I would ha' went back this mornin', ef it hadn't ha' been—"

And there she broke off abruptly. After a silent moment, she continued sadly, half tearfully: "And yet—and yet—the's not a bit o' use in me a-goin' back now!"

"Why?" Dale was smiling, and she was glad to note that he did not appear to be grieving over his misfortune.

"'Cause the' ain't," simply.

"But you'll go?"

"Yes," she said, "in the mornin' I'll go."

He bent toward her and held down his hand. "Good-by, little girl. I hope it will come out all right, and I believe it will."

Babe slowly lifted her hand to his. Her eyes were downcast.

"Good-by," she told him brokenly. "And I hope it will come out all right, too—God knows I do, Bill Dale."

Thus they parted. Dale rode back to the sheriff and Major Bradley, and a minute later the three of them started for the lowland and Cartersville jail.

When a bend in the dusty ox-wagon road had hidden them from view, Elizabeth Littleford turned homeward. Her mother followed her.

The younger woman dropped to the stone step at the vine-hung front porch with the air of one who is very tired, plucked a full-blown marigold and began absently to tear its petals slowly apart. Mrs. Littleford looked out across the meadows, sighed, smoothed back her gray hair with both hands, and sat down beside her daughter.

"I wouldn't worry about it, Babe, honey," she finally said. Then she too plucked a marigold and began to tear its petals slowly apart. "Ef he killed Adam Ball, it was to save himself. He's a good man, honey. I think he's about the best man I ever seed, Babe."

"No, he never killed Adam Ball to save hisself even," Babe replied. "He's a fighter, but he ain't no killer. Listen, mother, it might ha' been this away:

"He is ahind of a tree, and Adam is ahind of another tree. Adam shoots at his hat, and he shoots at Adam's hat—which is the reg'lar way of a two-man fight, as you know. Well, suddenly Adam he jumps up like he's been shot, and falls a-groanin' and a-twistin'. Bill Dale, a-thinkin' he's killed Adam, comes out from ahind of his tree. Havin' drawed Bill Dale out into the open by his trick, Adam gits ready to shoot and kill him. Jest as Adam is about to shoot, somebody else shoots and kills Adam and saves Bill Dale—mebbe the' ain't time fo' anything else. Now don't ye see? And don't it all sound natchel, mother?"

"I reckon it does," granted the old woman. "But who was it shot Black Adam?"

"Somebody who is a friend o' Bill Dale's," said Babe. "Somebody who was a-follerin' Bill with the idee o' pertectin' him ef he needed it. Somebody who knowed it was dangerous fo' him to go off by hisself in the woods that away. I've got it reasoned out jest like this. . . . And whoever it was 'at was friend enough to Bill Dale to kill a man to save him will be friend enough to own up when the proper time comes and keep Bill Dale from a-bein' hung. Whoever it was 'at done it is skeered bad now, but later on he'll shore tell it, ef it'll save Bill. You jest wait and see, mother.

"I hain't never fo'got," Babe went on, after a moment, "about Black Adam Ball a-tellin' me about a-workin' that same trick on a man over in Nawth Ca'liner—and he killed the man. The law never found it out. And ye see what Black Adam got. 'Who lives by the sword shall perish by the sword.' It's in the Good Book, mother, honey; and everything in the Good Book is God A'mighty's truth, as you know."

"Ef I was pinned down to guess who it was 'at done it," drawled Mrs. Littleford, "I'd guess it was By Heck. He was a plumb fool about Bill Dale. His maw she says he talks in his sleep about Bill Dale. He was allus a-follerin' him around like a dawg."

Babe pointed to the meadow. An aged and stooped and witchlike woman was limping slowly through the clover, coming toward them.

"Granny Heck," muttered Babe.

The neighborhood's newsbearer and fortune-teller limped on up to the cabin, and dropped to the stone step beside Ben Littleford's wife and daughter.

"La, la, la!" she panted, for the days were warm. "And hain't it jest turrible! I wisht I may die this minute ef I wouldn't migh't nigh as soon see my own son go to jail! But 'en it'll all come out right yit, Babe. I seed it in the cyards, and I seed it in the cup. Babe, honeydumplin', he never no more killed Adam 'an I killed him myself. I tell ye, the's been some awful ongodly work done, somehow. I know Bill Dale, and the' shore hain't nary durned drap o' killer blood in him."

Babe spoke suddenly to her mother: "I've got to go and wash and iron my new white dress. Acause—because I'm a-goin' back to Mrs. McLaurin, like I promised I'd go. I'm a-goin' in the mornin', on the fust train. Ye might as well inform pap to hatch up my railroad money, mother."

Just then By Heck stopped before the gate.

"Do ye want to go home along as I go, maw?" he asked.

The three women turned their eyes toward the lanky moonshiner. He was standing straighter than they had ever seen him standing before, and he held his repeater across one of his thin shoulders in a manner that was almost soldierly. It was as though he had just discovered a hitherto unknown depth to himself.

The truth was that he was carrying a secret that was great, and almost too much for him.

His aged mother rose with a rheumatic groan. "Looky here, By," she demanded, "what on earth's the matter of ye? Ha' ye done went and swallered a rifle's ramrod, or a fishin' pole, that ye walk so cussed straight and look like a plumb dadblamed fool?"

"No, maw," grinned her son, "Nothin' like it. I'm jest hongry, that's all. My gosh, ef I don't feel hongry enough to eat a whole raw yaller dawg! And top it off with a couple o' baked house-cats. Durn my eyes and blast my forrard. I wisht ye'd come and go home along as I go, maw, and git me some dinner."

"All right, By, all righty." To Mrs. Littleford, "Come down and bring yore knittin', and spend the day wi' me. Good luck to ye, Babe, when ye go back to the city!"

"No, Maw," Grinned Her Son.

When they were within a hundred yards of their cabin home beside the river, Granny Heck said to her son, whose mind seemed inordinately busy:

"Who d'ye reckon killed Black Adam, the hound dawg o' Torment, By, darlin'?"

"I'm a-lookin' fo' rain today," very quietly said By Heck.

"I axed you, sonny boy," the witch-like old woman went on, "who did you reckon killed Black Adam?"

"The's rain in the air," as though he had not heard. "Ef it don't rain today, it'll shore rain tonight."

"Now looky here!" snapped Granny Heck. "I said who did you think killed Adam Ball?"

By Heck did not smile, nor did he frown. "Ef it don't rain today nor tonight," he drawled, "it'll shore rain tomorrer. I tell ye, mother, the's rain in the air."

"By! By! Ye dadblamed idjit!" protested the old woman vehemently. "Now you answer me what it was I axed ye!"

Said Samuel Heck, unperturbed:

"Grandpap Moreland still has to take his old gray cat down off o' the front po'ch roof every mornin' of his life. Jim Littleford's wife's son's grandpa's son-in-law is named Jim Littleford. Abner Moreland's got a old speckled oxen 'at ain't got but one good eye. Isaac Littleford talks through his nose. Little Tom Moreland's pap's old 'coon dawg ketched a big, pore 'possum last night with one foot gone whar it had been gnawed off in a trap. Babe Littleford's got to be the hell-roarin'est, purtiest gyurl in the world. Bill Dale he said a man who'd say 'eyther' and 'neyther' in place o' 'eether' and 'neether' would part his hair in the middle and wear a bow on the back o' his hat and ribbon in his onderclo'es. Maw?"

"Whut!"

"Le' me ax ye a question," with a mock solemnity that was ultra-ridiculous. "Please don't try to joke wi' me, yore pore hongry che-ild. Maw, hawnest to goodness, will ye tell me the truth?"

Hopeful, she bent toward him. "O' course, honey boy, I'll tell ye the truth. What it is, darlin'?"

He whispered it: "Maw, don't deceive me. What was my maiden name?"

Granny Heck became so angry that she trembled. To her, baffled curiosity was but little better than torture.

"I wish I may drap dead right here in my tracks," she declared shrilly, "ef I git you a dadslatted bite to eat ontel you gi' me a sensible answer! Who, I said, dang it all, did you think it was killed Black Adam, the hound dawg o' puggatory?"

"Don't talk so infernal loud, mother," and By Heck smiled a pale smile. "I don't think who killed Black Adam: I know who killed Black Adam. But, igod, it needn't to worry Bill Dale none! Git this here, mother dear—whoever it was done it shore ain't a-goin' to let nary hair in Bill Dale's head suffer fo' it!"

One of old Granny Heck's bony fingers shot out toward her son like a weapon.

"It was you, By!" she accused. "It was you killed Black Adam Ball! Now own up to me, son, and I'll bake ye some cawnbread with aigs and hawg-renderin's in it. Wasn't it you that done it?"

By Heck looked toward some fleecy white clouds that were sailing slowly, like ships of silver and pearl in a sunny cerulean sea, over the rugged crest of the majestic Big pine.

"The's rain in the air," he drawled. "Ef it don't rain today, it'll rain tonight; and ef it don't rain tonight, it'll rain tomorrer. Yeuh; the's rain in the air, mother, as shore as dammit."

CHAPTER XII.

Jailed.

Cartersville nestles close between the points of two outlying foothills, and it is a delightfully lazy and old-fashioned town. For the most part it is made up of gabled old brick houses, which have pretty settings of green lawn, roses, honeysuckles and trees. Even in the small business district, the streets are lined with trees. They have electric lights there, and water mains, a common school and a high school, a courthouse, a jail and a theater.

It was a little after nightfall when Dale and the other two men rode through the shaded streets. Dale noted that the people they met under the swinging lights spoke cordially and with marked courtesy to his companions. It was very evident that the officer and Major Bradley were in high standing in their home town.

Sheriff Tom Flowers drew in before a hitching-rack that stood in front of the courthouse, a great old wooden building with a clock in its tower.

"We'll dismount here," said he.

They did. The major took the rein of Dale's horse.

"I'll see that the animal is well cared for, sir," he said to Dale. "And as soon as I have seen to our horses, I'll be with you. I wish to talk matters over with you. Suppose I bring supper for us both, eh?"

Dale thanked Bradley, and turned away with the officer. They walked a short block and entered a low, square building of brick and stone of which the windows were small and high and barred with iron. Dale knew that it was the Cartersville jail, and his heart sank in spite of him. Just as death by violence had been entirely new to him, so also was this entirely new to him.

Flowers took a ring of heavy keys from the hand of the jailer, and led the way down a whitewashed corridor. It was not yet bedtime, and the other prisoners were still up; some of them were reading newspapers, others were trying to mend their clothing, still others were doing nothing. A few of them called out boldly and bade the new prisoner welcome—and each of these received a gruff order from the sheriff to keep quiet. Dale paid no attention whatever to his would-be tormentors.

At an iron door at the end of the corridor, the officer halted and faced about.

"If there could be such a thing as a comfortable cell here," he said in low and kindly tones, "it's this one." He went on earnestly: "Now I want you to believe me when I tell you that it is with real regret that I put you behind a door of iron. But if I didn't do it, somebody else would do it; and it's possible that I can be a little more decent about it than another officer would be."

"I realize all that, y'know," replied Dale, "and I'm very much obliged to you, sheriff."

Flowers unlocked the door, and Bill Dale walked in. Flowers locked the door and went away.

JUDGE McCALL GIVES BERG FIVE YEARS

property in order to hinder and prevent the collection of the above verdict. Upon submitting the evidence in said case to the court, Judge McCall ruled the deeds to the lots in question were fraudulently made. Henry Aust, to whom the deeds were made and who defaulted at the trial, is declared to have no interest in the real estate involved. Jurisdiction is retained as to the principals in this case.

Arva Ash, who had previously entered a plea of guilty to the charge of bootlegging, was arraigned Tuesday afternoon. The extreme penalty is one year imprisonment and a $500 fine. This being his first offense the judge reduced the fine and sentenced the prisoner to five months in the county pail and to pay a fine of $200. In his remarks to the prisoner Judge McCall told him the bootlegging business was pretty poor business and caused more trouble in the world than any other, for where the bootlegger plied his trade, women and children were neglected and even went hungry. As a cure the judge administered the above antidote.

John Mathews, who was held to the grand jury by Mayor Baker of Eagle Grove, which body indicted him, entered a plea of guilty, whereupon the court ordered him to pay a fine of $800 and costs, including a $50 fee for the county attorney. It was further ordered that upon the payment of $300 the remainder of the fine was to be suspended during good behavior. A raid was made on the premises occupied by Mathews several weeks ago and a quantity of moonshine seized.

Being unable to secure bail bond Merle Snyder of Eagle Grove was placed in the county jail last week. He was indicted for breaking and entering a building in the night time and also for larceny of some auto tires from the building. In each instance the court fixed his bond at $3,000. He is an 18 year old lad. Alva Vinton, an older partner of Snyder, was held on the same counts and a like amount in bonds, which he was able to furnish.

Sheriff Bassett of Fort Dodge called on Sheriff Lang Monday. He said that the bondsman for the Jew in whose store was found clothing stolen from Woolstock and Goldfield, had been able to get hold of money and property to an amount nearly equal to the $3,000 bond. The Jew disappeared at the time of the trial and is thought to be in Mexico.

Sheriff Meekins of Webster City and Geo. Wheeler, a Woolstock merchant, were in Clarion yesterday. They took back a quantity of clothing etc., taken from Mr. Wheeler's store by robbers a year ago. It will be used as evidence in the Hamilton county district court against Roy Fortune, who is to have his trial this week.

J. W. Claggett, who was fined $5.00 in Mayor Baker's court at Eagle Grove for striking a fellow citizen appealed to the district court. After the jury had been secured, it is presumed the appellant gave them the once over and gave up the fight, at any rate he dismissed the case.

Geo. Moore, indicted on two counts for the larceny of harness, one from a farmer west of Eagle Grove and another living north of that city, has entered a plea of guilty and will receive his sentence on Monday next.

Defendants defaulted in case of M. J. Thol of Belmond vs. Ray Morris and Alfred Swenson and plaintiff is granted a special execution by the court to collect $473 amount is balance due for rent of garage building.

Tillinghast & Co. of Clarion have been awarded judgment against Ewing Bros., through default, on account for $40. Ziegler Hardware Co., has been given judgment against the same defendant for $66.-50.

H. E. VanBuskirk of Belmond, a paroled patient from the hospital at Cherokee, was returned to that institution yesterday by Deputy Denby. He had become afflicted again.

Strike or no strike the court house folks will be able to keep warm for several weeks to come. A car load of soft coal was placed in the basement last week.

Two cases, both suits on notes against the Iowa Valley Sugor Co. of Belmond, have been settled. They were brought by the Wm. Galloway Co., one for $442.75 and the other for $295.17.

Miss Bock took advantage of the fine weather last week and visited nearly one-half of the rural schools of the county. She hopes to soon complete her annual visitation.

John Ruhl of Belmond, who was indicted on a nuisance charge, intoxicating liquor being the main issue, has been released on bail, his bond being fixed at $500.

A judgment for $147 is given Neuman & Co. against Geo. Vivian, he having failed to appear and defend.

A. E. Gouchenour vs. Henry Teget et al has been contiued by agreement.

Wright County Schools

Did you know that there were 5034 pupils in the schools of Wright county last year. Of this number 3070 are in the town schools and 1964 in the rural districts. It requires 278 teachers to instruct these pupils—127 in the independent districts and 151 in the country. The value of the town school buildings is $459,050 as against $92,120 in the rural communities.

"A CHEERFUL LIAR" TO LIE HERE FRIDAY NIGHT

High School Is Starting Activities For The Winter

Gym Floor Is Now In Shape And Basket Ball Games Are Being Scheduled

FACULTY ENTERTAINED FRI.

The October meeting of the Normal Training club will be held Saturday evening Oct. 29. We plan to have Miss Bock, County superintendent, present at this meeting and every member should be there.

On Friday evening Oct. 21 the faculty were entertained at a Hallowe'en party by the Misses Stedman, Newgard and Eastman. The gymnasium was a corn field lighted by jack o' lanterns. There was a dark and dangerous pathway by which to reach this field, but after arriving there we were entertained by games and stunts appropriate for Hallowe'en. Best of all were the good things we had to eat.

Division I of the Literary society will give a Hallowe'n program Friday Oct. 28 at 2:30. The patrons of the school are invited to be present.

On Wednesday and Thursday of this week the Senior Normal Training class will observe rural schools in operation.

The first number of the lecture course was enjoyed by those present. There are three more numbers on the course. Plan to attend them, Dec. 15, Jan. 16 and Feb. 24. Season tickets may be obtained any time before Dec. 15 but those in charge would appreciate the purchasing of tickets as soon as possible in order that we may be sure the course will pay out.

Thornton baseball team was defeated Friday afternoon by a one-sided score. This game closes the baseball season until next April.

The basket ball season is now on. The new floor has been completed in the gym and the teams took up their first real practice Tuesday night. The season athletic tickets will be put on sale this week, good for six games. Games have already been scheduled with Sheffield, Dows and Clarion. We expect games with Rowan Swaledale, Kanawha Hampton Corwith and Mason City, if dates can be arranged. Next week a game will be scheduled with the high school teams and former B. H. S. stars. This game will be free to all who purchase season tickets. Back our teams and they will play fast ball this season.

Miss Brooks has been absent from school during the past week because of illness.

Mrs. Ben Hogenson has been elected permanent teacher of the "overflow" room.

Miss Liddle, our county nurse, is spending the week making a survey of the local schools.

BOOZE MAKER IS FOUND GUILTY

John Ruhl, an inhabitant of the hill west of town, was found guilty in district court yesterday on a charge of maintaining a liquor nuisance and will receive his sentence at 1:30 Friday afternoon.

Ruhl was arrested last spring in a raid made by the local police authorities in which they found over 30 quarts of beer and a gallon jug of real honest to goodness corn whiskey. The liquor was tested by a chemist and the beer found to contain eight per cent grain alcohol while the jug of whiskey registered around thirty-five per cent. The son plead guilty last spring to selling it while the father stood trial. A jury trial was held. This is the conclusion of a long tussle locally on the booze question on the hill. There are still some places and people who need a little investigating and doubtless they will receive it in due time.

FAMILY GATHERING HELD AT E. F. BAILEY HOME

The three Bailey families—E. F., Floyd and Thayne,—the Snyder and Scott and the Purcell families enjoyed a family gathering at the E. F. Bailey home on Monday evening of this week the occasin being the birthday of two members of the family group, Clarence Scott and Miss Doris Bailey. The evening was spent in games and social entertainment, and delicious refreshments were a feature of the evening. The house was very prettily decorated in the Hallowe'en style. An enjoyable evening was reported by all present.

OBITUARY OF EDNA PALS

After considerable suffering little Edna Pals, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lambert Pals, was graciusly relieved from all further pain and from all the many ills sins and disappointments incident to all human life. The Lord Jesus took compassion on her. A bud, he plucked her from the stem to transplant her in Paradise, there to bloom and to beautify the Garden of God.

She was born on the 24th of Aug. and died on the evening of Oct. 20. She thus attained the age of two months lacking four days. The rite of Holy Baptism was administered to her only a few Sundays ago in the church of whose Sunday school she was enrolled in the Cradle Roll department.

She was first afflicted with a disease of the skin. She was almost entirely cured when another trouble, this time internally, took hold of her and resulted in her early death.

"Who plucked that flower?" asked the gardener, in anger, as he saw the broken stem of a rare and choice flower upon which he had bestowed great care. "It was I," said the Master, and the gardener held his peace.

Mr. and Mrs. Pals desire to sincerely extend their heartfelt gratitude to their neighbors and friends who stood by them in their trials and who helped take care of little Edna by night and day. ***

RED CROSS ROLL CALL IS COMING

The Wright County chapter Red Cross membership enrollment in the coming Roll Call which opens on November 11, Armistice day, and continues until Thanksgiving, November 27, will be in charge of Mrs. Geo. A. Richards of the Clarion chapter. Acceptance of this important post has just been sent to Chicago headquarters of the Central Division, of which this is a part.

Local support of the Red Cross is expected not only to reach but surpass that of this past year, since the organization is not only equipped to function in community work, here, but is called upon to act in national emergencies and distasters. The recent calls upon the Red Cross in the Pueblo and San Antonia floods as well as the obligations it is still discharging toward disabled ex-service men, place the responsibility for these humanitarian undertaking upon the shoulders of every person with "the heart and the dollar."

During the past month, the numbers of new soldier cases needing care and treatment have been brought to public attention and through the work of the "Clean Up" Squads a realization of the importance of work the Red Cross is doing for service men the country over has been increasingly manifest. That more than $10,000-000 has been expended in this work by the national organization within the year proves the need of its continual support.

Under the new arrangment all funds remain with the local chapter for support of its present activities with the exception of fifty cents from each annual, contributing or sustaining membership. These funds go to support disaster releif, soldier work and other projects.

Plans for Roll Call activities here will be announced shortly. Mrs. Richards and co-workers expect to wage a vigorous campaign for new and renew all Red Cross memberships.—News.

THE BELMOND INDEPENDENT ONE YEAR $1

The week of November 1 to 7 is Subscribe for Your Home Town Paper week, and the Independent, in co-operation with the nation-wide movement, is offering the Belmond Independent one year for one dollar to new subscribers only in that week.

Subscriptions must be new, and must be entered in that week. They may be ordered to start immediately, or any time up to January 1, 1922. They may be paid any time up to December 1.

The Independent for one dollar is the biggest bargain in the newspaper line that has been offered for a long time, and at that price there is a loss on the paper to the publisher. But the increased circulation which the offer is expected to bring, and the additional revenue at a time when it is needed, will balance the account.

The Independent is ALL HOME PRINT, and carries the HOME NEWS of every class; it more fully represents Belmond than any other medium. We let the paper speak for itself, and offer you the opportunity for one week only to subscribe one year for one dollar.

ARMISTICE DAY

What are the plans of the local post of the American Legion and of the Chamber of Commerce toward observing Armistice Day this year? That the town should observe the day goes without saying, and the Independent would like to see a real celebration of the event staged. Why not get the thing started? The local post of the Legion has an excellent opportunity to hold one of the best observations of the day ever witnessed in this country. Why not [illegible] day on the military order, [illegible] some snappy drills, exhibitions and perhaps a sham battle? There are very few people in Belmond who ever saw a military drill, and an event of that kind would go big. Why not invite the neighboring posts of Alexander, Rowan, Goodell and Meservey to come in on the day and make it a regular community affair?

FIRE IN TIMES GAZETTE BASEMENT

Eagle: Fire was discovered in the basement of the Times-Gazette office Monday afternoon. The timely arrival of the fire truck and fire department saved the building and contents The heaviest loser will be Mr. Jones who had a large amount of potatoes and apples stored in the basement After the fire Jones was serving potatoes to his friends, almost any style The only damage to the contents of the printing office was from smoke. Fire Chief Shaunce handled this blaze without turning the water into the printing office at all. The fire was around and above the furnace and considerable damage was done to the floor of the building. The building and printing office were insured but Mr. Jones carried no insurance.

EARL PETER PETERSON

Earl Peter Peterson was born on the Peterson farm five miles west of Belmond on the 22nd day of December, 1904, and died at the home of his grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. M. C. Madsen in Belmond, Friday October 21st 1921, being at the time of his death 16 years, 9 months and 29 days old. He had been sick since last March with the dread disease diabetes and altho on a diet the entire time the disease could not be checked. He had never complained, bearing his trouble cheerfully and on Thursday before his death he fell into a coma from which he was not aroused until death released him from the clutches of disease the next afternoon. Earl was a loving and dutiful son, always thinking of his family and friends who did everything within their power to make his trial as easy as possible. He was the eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. George Peterson who themselves had grown up in Belmond. He attended school in Belmond, and at Story City and Ames where his parents had resided. He came with his mother and sister to Belmond last summer and remained here until his death. Their friends here feel the sincerest sympathy for the bereaved parents and family.

COMMUNITY CLUB MEETING

The regular meeting of the Community Welfare club will be held on this week Friday, October 28, in the library basement.

Mrs. A. E. Martin will demonstrate making dress forms. These forms are very highly recommended by ladies who have them. They cost less than a dollar so every woman can afford to have one. Five forms will be made Friday afternoon.

The meeting opens promptly at 2:30. Every woman in the community is invited to attend this meeting.

The serving committee will be Mrs. F. O. Fitts, Mrs. Henry Schultz, Mrs. P. J. Amblie, Mrs. Ralph Christie, Mrs. Russell, Mrs. Ted Townsan, Mrs. Clarence Scott, Mrs. R. C. Morse and Miss Thera Fitts.

GARNER PAPER RUNNING GOODELL SECTION

The Garner Leader came to our desk this week with a two-page section devoted exclusively to the news and advertising of Goodell, and the Leader made an attractive feature out of it. The Goodell section is run as a part of the Leader, instead of as a sperate insert as the Independent carries the Meservey section. It will no doubt result in much additional circulation to the Leader as well as business and will place the Leader in a commanding position in that territory. The running of these sections for the smaller towns around is a move that we believe will be done more and more, for it furnishes the small town with newspaper representation.

HOME TALENT TO BE GIVEN AT OPERA HOUSE

An All Star Caste To Present Three Act Comedy Friday Night Oct. 28th

COMMUNITY CLUB BENEFIT

Laughable Farce With All-Star Home Actors Is Feature Of Week's Events

"A Cheerful Liar" is the name of the play, and he will tell his tales for the benefit of the Community club at the opera house on Friday night of this week.

It is an all star caste, of the well known local actors who have delighted the Belmond people before, and it will be well worth the attending to judge frof what the kids who have been peeking thru the windows at rehersals say.

The play is being staged as a benefit to the Community Club, and the caste of characters may be found on page ten of the Independent of this issue. We believe that you will say from those who are to take part that it is going to be worth while. Come out Friday night, have a good time and boost for the club.

"MUGGING" CRIMINALS IS SHERIFFS NEW JOB

"Mugging" criminals, taking their finger prints and photographs, and making complete records of their measurements according to the Bertillion system, is the latest requirement of the sheriff's office. "Now look pleasant, please," sheriff Lang will say, squinting thru a big camera at some suspected band robber, and just as soon a Deputy Denger snaps the handcuffs on a desperado, he will lead him into the "studio" to ink his fingers, make everlasting records of the prints of his ten digit and then measure him much after the fashion of the old country tailor. make finger prints and photographs

Under the provisions of a law enacted by the last legislature, the attorney general of Iowa is required to to create a bureau of criminal investagation. Each sheriff is required to make finger prints and photographs of all persons arrested and held for investigation or to answer to some crime, and these records must be forwarded promptly to the bureau of investigation.

Sheriffs and police departments will also report all auto thefts, robberies and similar crimes to the bureau of investigation and supply a list of the criminals wanted in their vicinity.

LARGE BARN BURNS

At an early hour Friday morning of last week fire destroyed a large barn on the W. C. Smith farm east of Eagle Grove. Four horses and three mules were burned to death. Mr. Fisher, who is on the place, also lost about 30 tons of hay and all of his harness. Insurance was carried on the horses for $150 each and on the hay for $200. A queer feature of the fire was the discovering of bones in the ashes which resembled human bones. The coroner was summoned and an investigation made, but the bones had been raked from the fire and most of them disappeared. For that reason Dr. Walker the coroner was unable to state postively that the bones were those of a human being. They were found under the edge of the big pile of hay and the intense heat had practically reduced them to ashes.

Hon. Eugene Shaffter of Eagle Grove. state senator from this district, has been in poor health the past several months. Pernicious anemia is his malady which has baffled the efforts of his physicians.

U. B. CHURCH NOTES

Those that attended the Hancock county Sunday school convention felt well paid for going.

Eight Sunday schools were represented. The addresses by Miss Dean and O. G. Herbrecht, state workers were excellent. Miss Dean presented the work with children and Mr. Herbrecht that of the young people. The Sunday school work is one of most important agencies for building up the moral character of our country.

Every parent should see that their children are in some Sunday school and the best way for the parents to get their children into the Sunday school is for them to go themselves.

The Women's Missionary society is to hold their annual Womans Day Sunday, Oct. 30. At that time they will give the missionary exercise The Voices of the Women.

Sheriff Lang found some of the clothing in their possession and the parties are now boarding at Hotel Lang in default of $1,000 bond in each case.—Monitor.

FOUR CENTS FOR CORN

Despite the fact that they are out of a job, and that they are not earning anything, the average young man now will not go out and pick corn at three cents a bushel. They want four.

And they won't get it, a least but in islated cases. Three cents is all that the job is worth right now, and more than the farmer can afford to pay. Four cents is out of the question; if a farmer pays four cents a bushel to have his corn picked he is driven to the wall to save the crop, and the man who makes him pay that is as much of a profiteer as the man who keeps the price of his goods up.

No farmer is going to make any money from his corn this year; not when he sells for 28 cents and it costs him about thirty to pay the freight. If he pays three cents for picking he is paying all the job is worth, and all that he can afford to pay.

If there has been one there have been a dozen young men who called at the Independent office the past month wanting work; they have had tears in their eyes as they asked if there was a job open. But—they did not see corn picking at three cents and their meals. For such a man there is no sympathy; he will have to be starved to a realization that right now a job is a job, and he who has one is lucky; he should hang onto it.

It was a case two years ago of, when a man was offed a job of his "considering" it; now it is a case of his getting it, and not stopping to consider. Winter is the next door away, and how about food and shelter this winter? As the wise man two years ago was the man who put by a little for the future, so today is the wise man the man who gets a job—no matter if it is at three cents—and sticks by it. Any job is going to be better than no job when you are out of work.

THE GREATEST TROUBLE

The farmer today is in a position where he is damned if he does and damned if he doesn't. He has on the erage a good crop to sell, and he can't get anything for it. If he does sell the cost of transporting it to the markets is more than the crop is wrth. The greatest trouble with the situation today is that same transportation problem.

The freight rates are altogether out of reason. The railroad company is certainly running the game to the limit, and making the farmer foot the bill. It costs as much or more than the crop is worth on the market to ship it. Freight rates must be reduced before there can be any opportunity to get back to normal. And until they are reduced the country will have to suffer. Agriculture is the foundation of American prosperity; unless the foundation is secure what chance has the rest of the structrue? Would you build a big expensive house and build it on a foundation of sand? That is what the prosperity of America is built on today, and is it any wonder that the building wobbles?

Lower freight rates will mean a better price on the market, and the better price means better times. To say that the times now are hard is putting the matter in a wrong light; they are more tight, or difficult, than hard. We have plenty to eat, but we haven't any money to spare. Bring the cost of transportation down to a medium where it does not eat up all the profit there is—in other words, bring the railroads to time—and there will be a vast change in the condition of the county.

Are the railroads of this country entitled to anything? Has it not always been the history of the country that the railroads were given the first chance at the pudding? Recently the Independent received a letter stating that plates would be furnished free which dealt with the terrible shape the railroads were in, and telling why they had to have the high rates to pull thru and save the whole country from going to the bow wows. Who pays for the plates? Plates cost money; who foots the bill that the ignorant, obliging country editor may tell his farmer readers how much worse off the railroads are than they and how they ought to donate their year's labor to the broken-down, desperate railroads and help save this country from ruin? Forget that noise. Have you heard of any of the transportation lines being sold out or going to the wall? Then just stack up the cases you know of where men on the farms have lost all that they had or have made in this last year's work.

Average up the loss a little; let big business take its portion of the rind along with the rest and pass the meat further along the table so that the fellow at the end can at least get a smell of it anyway.

THE BAREFOOT BOY.

The time was when newspaper men turned the epic of barefoot boys on frosty morns, going for the old milk cows that had strayed far afield. Having originated on the farm, where they had heard their forbears tell of such experiences, these scribes had perhaps originated on the farm themselves. By much circumlocution they had reached the city, there to pine and pore, and eke out an existence by a facile pen.

Memories of those other days caused them to turn to narratives that had been doled out around the old family cook stove back on the farm when granddad told of how the blood of life was running warm, when he, himself, was a barefoot boy, down on the farm.

Into the cup that was taken to cheer, and which cheered to inebriation, fell many a tear and sorrow, dropped there by these sympathetic scribes whose memory ran back to granddad's narrative of those better days.

In these children of their fancies these scribes depicted how the barefoot boy evicted old Brindle from her berth in the high, frost coated grass, that they might warm their bare feet. They even went so far as to depict the tingles of pain that followed the first revulsions from cold to heat; how the toes tingled; how the dew cracks smarted and burned; how the body waited for the cattle to get a good long start toward the barn yard before setting out from his fireless heater, to dash through the frosty grass to overtake them.

How well the picture was painted! How we all felt for the barefoot boy. How we all wished that he had had a good dog to bring in the cows from out the pasture under stars looking down, cold and calm and a frost coated verdure. How we wished, out of sympathy for the boy, that his dad had left them stanchioned over night. What was the use of turning them out to the pasture for the night anyway? A few of the farm boys a quarter of a century back did go barefooted to the fields at morn to drive back to the barn, old Brindle, she of the crumpled horn.

Poor little fellow! Perhaps, and more than likely, he now owns a big farm of his own, and being in the cattle business big and plenty keeps no milk cows for his own son to go barefooted afield for under the morning stars through frosted grass. If his son does go after cows it is after sunup, and the latter generation probably rides a pony, or maybe he chases the cows in from off the deck of a Ford. Perhaps the barefoot boy of yesterday is now a banker, up on Wall street, wearing patent leather shoes, and turning back to pumpkin pies, fresh apple cider, new sorghum molasses, hot biscuits and honey while trying to bring his satiated appetite to taking on a fillet mignon, or goose livers with mushroom sauce.

But after all, the boy that went out on frosty mornings and dispossessed a cow of her sleeping quarterr that he might warm his cold and aching feet, was largely a myht. There were some of them, but they were few. He is one of those pleasant personages of bygone days that floats in on the screen of retrospection of those plaintive chronicles of ancient scribes that we consider.—Chronicle.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

CHAPTER VI.—To get proper surgical aid, John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Dale convey "Babe," unconscious, to the city. Doctors assure them she is not seriously hurt. Dale meets an old friend, Bobby McLaurin, who had married Patricia Clavering. Telling his father of David Moreland's coal, the old gentleman's actions convince his son of his father's guilt in the killing of Moreland.

CHAPTER VII.—It is arranged that "Babe" is to stay with Mrs. McLaurin to be educated. Dale, refusing his father's proffered financial aid to develop the mine, interests Newton Wheatley, capitalist, who agrees to furnish the money. Dale realizes he loves "Babe."

CHAPTER VIII. — Returning to the Halfway Switch, Dale meets Major Bradley, lawyer, and real friend of the mountaineers, whom he engages as counsel for the company. A man named Goff, of evil repute, tries to bribe Dale to betray the Morelands by selling him the coal deposits, and telling them they are of little value. Dale attempts to thrash him, but Goff draws a revolver. Dale is unarmed.

CHAPTER IX.—Goff enlists the aid of a turbulent crowd, the Balls and Torreys, to make trouble for Dale's company. The Littlefords and Morelands agree to forget the old feud and dwell in harmony.

CHAPTER X.—"Babe" returns to her home, fearing she is a burden to the McLaurins. Dale remonstrates, and she agrees to go back, for the sake of an education. Waylaid by "Black Adam" Ball, Dale fights a pistol duel with the desperado, and Ball is killed. Dale is arrested and taken to jail at Cartersville. He doesn't see how his shot could have killed Ball.

CHAPTER XI.—There is much speculation as to who really killed Ball, the general opinion being it was By Heck, who had constituted himself Dale's guardian.

CHAPTER XII. — Caleb Moreland, son of John Moreland, admits firing the shot which killed Ball, and takes Dale's place in jail. He is innocent, but takes the blame for the killing in order that Dale can continue the development of the mine.

Dale began to inspect his quarters. To all appearances, they were at least clean. There was a narrow bed covered with a pair of gray blankets, a stool and a soapbox, and nothing more. The light in the corridor behind him made snaky black lines of bar-shadows on the brick partition walls and the outer wall of stone. Dale shuddered in spite of himself. He put up one hand and turned on a small light, which dissipated the uncanny shadows—and showed him a line from Dante's "Inferno" that to him seemed very miserable; some former occupant of that cell had written it with charcoal on the whitewashed outer wall.

Then Dale sat wearily down on the narrow bed, leaned his head upon his hands, and began to think.

He had always wanted difficulties to overcome, barriers to surmount, a work to do, a fight to fight for himself. In full measure he had found them every one. He did not doubt his ability to overcome the difficulties, surmount the barriers, do his work well and fight his fight as a good man fights, and win—if it were not for the charge of having shot and killed Black Adam Ball! It seemed to him now that that must end all that was worth while for him. For that was more than a difficulty, more than a barrier.

He firmly believed that it had been his bullet that had finished the earthly existence of the giant hillman. True, it had been an accident. But how was he to convince a jury that it had been an accident? Would the jury take his word for it? The jury would not, of course.

The mysterious third shot, that had come from a little distance—but he could not reasonably expect deliverance from that source. If only he had held down his abominable, savage temper; if only he had—

Major Bradley interrupted his unpleasant train of thought.

"No brooding there, my boy!"

Dale looked up. The old attorney, as neat in appearance as though he had not even seen a saddle that day, was standing just outside the hateful door of bars. Beside him stood a whiteclad negro boy with a big tray of steaming food on one hand and a pot of steaming coffee in the other.

The jailer came and unlocked the door; also he very considerately brought another stool and fresh water. The major entered the cell, and the negro followed.

An amused twinkle appeared in Dale's eyes as Bradley put the tray down on the soapbox. There was enough for five threshing-machine hands! The black boy was sent to the front door to wait.

"I thought you'd be as hungry as I am, and I'm as hungry as poor old By Heck ever was!" laughed the major, as he sat down and began to pour the coffee. "Riding always made me as hungry as a bear in April. Light right into it, Dale. There's nothing like a good steak, for any meal, when a fellow is half starved; eh, Dale? Try that one, won't you? I told Massengale I'd cause his beheadment if these steaks weren't perfect. Massengale," he added, "runs the hotel here, the Eureka Funeral Parlors, and the One-Price Clothing Emporium."

"I wonder," smiled Bill Dale, "what he does with his spare time?"

Bradley laughed, his eyes twinkling merrily. Dale found that he too was hungry, now that savory odors had invaded his nostrils. A minute later, and he had pronounced his steak delicious.

"Massengale shall not suffer beheadment," said the major; and he began to carve his own steak.

It was an excellent meal, the grim surroundings notwithstanding. When it was over, the negro boy came and took away the dishes, and received with a gladsome grin the two silver coins that were given him. Then Bradley produced a handful of cigars, and two of them were promptly lighted.

"Now, sir," said the old lawyer, "I feel like talking. Let's see, you gave your man Hayes orders to carry the work right along as though nothing had happened, didn't you? And the sheriff is to go back the day after tomorrow to arrest two or three Balls and two or three Torreys, to see what he can find out concerning the dynamiting of the two buildings and the trestle—today was not a good time to make the arrests. Am I correct?"

"Correct," nodded Dale.

Bradley regarded his cigar thoughtfully.

"Now," he said in a low tone, suddenly lifting his gaze to the other's face, "tell me about the thing that brought you here. Don't omit even the slightest detail. Nobody can overhear you if you will hold your voice down. These walls are very thick, you see. Well, you may begin."

In carefully guarded tones, Bill Dale gave a straightforward account of the whole unfortunate occurrence. The major listened intently to every word of it, so intently that he allowed his cigar to go out. Often he stopped his client and asked him to repeat certain portions of the story in order that he might be doubly sure of a point.

As Major Bradley rose to ask the jailer to come and let him out, Dale muttered downheartedly:

"Tell me, major: what do you think of my case? It looks rather bad, doesn't it?"

"Not bad enough to warrant your feeling blue over it, my boy!" said Bradley, showing his polished white teeth in a smile that was meant to be reassuring. "I think we'll get you out of it. Anyway, don't worry about it. Worry will kill a cat, they say! You didn't kill Adam Ball. John Moreland had taught you how to shoot pretty well; and if you took even half as careful an aim as you think you did, you couldn't have missed Ball's hat by so much.

"I have an idea, Dale," he resumed, "that if we knew who fired that third shot we'd know who did for Ball. It might have been done in order to save you. Ball was noted, I understand, as an unfair and tricky fighter. He might have been trying to trick you when he rose and fell groaning. Perhaps he meant to draw you into the open, that he might have a clean shot at you. Eh?"

Dale shook his head goomily.

"Hardly plausible, major. In that event there was nothing against the man whose bullet finished Ball, because he did it to save me; and he would have owned to it and prevented my arrest. A man who liked me well enough to kill Ball to save my life would like me well enough to confess and save me from suffering for it. I am sure of that, major."

"Ah, my boy," smiled the older of the two, "you don't yet know the mountain heart. Jail is a terrible thing to the liberty-loving mountaineer. But love of you, and love of fair-dealing, will soon overcome the fear of jail, and you will be freed—if what I strongly suspect proves to be well founded. I'll leave you now, Dale. I'll see you in the morning, sir. Good-night!"

When his optimistic attorney had gone, Dale glanced once more at the to him miserable line from Dante's "Inferno," and began to remove his outer clothing preparatory to going to bed. He did not feel anything like so confident concerning the outcome of his trial as Major Bradley evidently felt. Then he became even more dejected, and he told himself that the major had spoken so reassuringly merely to help him keep up heart.

The night passed, and another bright summer day dawned, and in the Cartersville jail there was one prisoner who had not slept at all. Each of those long and heavy black hours had been an age to this prisoner to whom jail was so new.

At noon a furious windstorm, accompanied by much vivid lightning and blinding rain, sprang out of the west and began to sweep the countryside and out of the lowering wet gloom there came one to deliver Bill Dale. He was a mountaineer, young and stalwart and strong, and about him there was much of that certain English fineness that was so striking in his father.

He entered the low, square building of brick and stone and stopped in the center of the corridor, where he stood, while water ran from his wet clothing and gathered in little pools at his feet, and looked to his right and to his left. Dale saw him, and cried out in surprise:

"Caleb!"

Caleb Moreland walked straight, his head up and his shoulders back, a splendid picture of virile young manhood, to the end of the corridor. He gripped two of the door's hated bars, bars that had long been worn smooth by other human hands; he pressed his smoothly shaven, sunburned face against the iron, and smiled.

"How are ye a-feelin' by this time, Bill? It's some h—l of a place, ain't it?"

Dale took a step toward him. "Well, a queen's boudoir is nicer. What are you doing here, Cale?"

"I've come to set you free," said Caleb Moreland.

Dale stared unbelievingly. "But that is impossible, Cale. How could you set me free?"

"Call Tom Flowers, and I'll sight ye."

Dale called, and the officer came immediately. Caleb Moreland turned from the cell door and faced him.

"I've come here to own up to the

"I've Come Here to Own Up to the Killin' o' Black Adam Ball," Began the Young Hillman.

killin' o' Black Adam Ball," began the young hillman.

He swallowed, went a trifle pale under his tan, and continued bravely:

"Bill Dale thar, he never done it. I am the one 'at done it. Bill he shot at Adam, but he missed—Adam had done shot at Bill fust, y'onderstand, Tom. But I didn't miss. I don't never miss. I'm a plumb tombstone shot. They allus rules me out at any shootin' match. I'd ha' owned up to it yeste'-day, but the thought o' jail had me skeered bad. I jest cain't let as good a man as Bill Dale thar suffer fo' a thing I done myself. So you let him out, Tom, and put the right man in thar."

Flowers had a good heart, and this touched it. But he was not very much surprised.

"Tell us about it, Caleb," he requested.

Caleb looked toward Dale, then he faced the lord of Cartersville's little prison again.

"Well, shuriff, when I seed Bill Dale go off toward the trustle by hisself and alone, I knowed right then he was in danger o' bein' laywayed by some o' them thar lowdown Balls and Cherokee Torreys. So I decides to foller atter him and gyard him, without him a-knowin' anything about it, which same I done. When he met Adam Ball—"

He broke off abruptly.

"Go on," urged Flowers.

"I reckon I won't," smiled Caleb, and his eyes were still twinkling. "I reckon I won't do no more talkin' jest now. Yes, I reckon the proper place fo' me to do my big talkin' is in the co'tehouse at my trial. Lock me up, will ye Tom?"

"We'll see," said Flowers.

Forthwith he dispatched a deputy for Judge Carter and Major Bradley, who hastened to the jail.

An hour later Caleb Moreland was the occupant of the cell at the end of the whitewashed corridor, and Dale was mounting his bay horse Fox to ride back into the heart of the everlasting hills. He arrived two hours after nightfall. The Morelands were glad to see him, and the Littlefords were glad to see him. There was rejoicing there in the broad valley that lies between David Moreland's mountain and the Big Pine. Everybody had been expecting him, and many were the pairs of eyes that had been watching for him. He found himself suddenly wishing, with a tightening at his throat, that his father could know how much bigger and how much better it was to be thus esteemed than to be wealthy.

Luke took charge of his tired horse and led it away to the old log barn and to some fifteen ears of yellow corn. Luke's father escorted him proudly, the guest of honor, in to one of Addie Moreland's incomparable old-fashioned suppers, which was none the worse for being late. Several Littlefords sat at the long, home-made table.

John Moreland turned up the light a little, and cracked a worn but timely joke; then he looked toward one of the men whom he had fought throughout many years, and muttered into his thick brown beard:

"Saul, friend, will ye do us the favor o' axin' the blessin', ef ye please?"

"Shore, John, o' course."

Saul Littleford, the very illiterate, laced his big fingers together across his plate, bent his head, and told the good Almighty that they were all very much obliged to Him for the fine supper they had before them, for Addie Moreland who had cooked it, for peace, and for Bill Dale. . . .

It was almost midnight when the visitors left. They had been sitting outside, on the honeysuckle-scented front porch and in the cabin yard. At last Bill Dale and John Moreland were left together on the porch.

"There's a thing that has puzzled me since the moment I got here this evening," said Dale. "Why is it that nobody seems to be grieving over Caleb's being in jail?"

The big hillman's answer came almost sharply: "No Moreland ever grieved over a sacrifyce, Bill."

Dale sat up straight. "A sacrifice! What do you mean?"

This time the big hillman's answer came slowly. "I mean 'at Cale he's a-takin' all o' the load off o' yore shoulders 'at he can. Cale he's a-takin' yore place in jail ontel the trial comes off, which'll be at the October term o' co'te. He trusts you to come back and set him free on the day o' the trial. O' course you'll do it; we hain't never doubted that fo' one little minute, Bill. But it wasn't all done fo' yore sake. You're the hope o' the Morelands, and you can do a heap more here 'an Caleb can."

He leaned toward Bill Dale and went on in a confidential tone:

"And I can tell ye this here, ef you're found guilty o' killin' Adam Ball, and sentenced fo' even one year, the Morelands and the Littlefords is a-goin' to take ye from the officers and turn ye loose with a good, long start on the law."

"Wouldn't that be rather—"

Dale broke off because he had seen the tall figure of a man appear in the open gateway. It was By Heck, and he spoke.

"Hello, John Moreland!"

"Hello yeself!" growled Moreland, who was not at all pleased at the interruption.

Heck advanced, carrying his rifle by its muzzle. He halted with one foot on the stone step.

"I've got news fo' ye, Bill," he said, recognizing Dale even in the darkness. "I've been a-eavesdrappin' up at old Ball's house, and I had to choke about ten dawgs to do it. Bill, old boy, them Balls has done swore by everything on earth and in Heaven and in Torment 'at they'll kill you ef the law don't. Igod, ye'd better watch out, Bill."

John Moreland rose from his chair.

"Much obleeged to ye, By. And good-night to ye. Le's go into the house, Bill. I didn't think them d—d pole-cats had that much narve—and I don't hardly believe it yit. It might ha' been white licker a-talkin. Their kind o' white licker ain't hawnest, like By Heck's is, though his'n is bad enough. Their kind'll make a man resurrect his dead inemies out o' the graveyard and shoot 'em up all over again. It ain't a-goin' to do a great deal o' harm, Bill, ef ye don't light no lamp when ye go to bed. A man cain't never tell jest what's a-goin' to happen."

"And the Ball-Torrey outfit—" Dale began, when the Moreland chief cut in:

"Ef the Ball-Torrey outfit pesters you, they're every one purty durned apt to die with what is knowed gen'ally in this section as the rifle-bullet disease."

CHAPTER XIII

Sentenced to Hang.

Sheriff Tom Flowers and four able deputies rode out of Cartersville very early on the following morning. They went to the Big Pine mountain country, and, by a scheme that entailed some shrewdness on the part of the chief officer, arrested two Balls and two Torreys on suspicion and took them away without trouble.

The two Balls and the two Torreys were lodged in the Cartersville jail and offered their liberty and exoneration from all blame in the dynamiting affair if they would give the names of the other guilty parties and appear against them. The mountaineers declared stoutly that they knew nothing whatever of the matter, and when pressure was applied they grew sullen and refused to talk at all.

It was plain to Flowers that they did know something about it, and he finally ordered that they be kept in a cell on a diet of bread and water until their tongues loosened. At which the Balls and Torreys swore loudly and swore that they would rot in jail first—unless their kinsmen came and shot up the town and liberated them by force!

"To me that is proof that you four are guilty," grimly smiled the sheriff. "And if your folks want to try storming the jail, let them. A full company of militia can be rushed here within an hour, at any time, and we'll give your folks all the fun they want."

It may be recorded that the four hillmen never confessed.

* * * * * * * *

Bill Dale, closely shadowed by one lanky Samuel Heck with his inevitable, ever-ready rifle, went among the workers with a cheer that he did not feel. For Caleb Moreland was in jail, and Caleb Moreland was innocent. But there was one sincere delight for Dale: Hayes was driving the little railroad ahead with all his might and all the might of his men. Hayes was in high favor with those under him; they worked even harder when he was absent than they worked when he was standing over them.

The days ran on, and there was no sign of a hostile demonstration from the Balls and Torreys. Judging from appearances, they were wholly satisfied with Caleb Moreland's being in jail.

Henderson Goff had disappeared. Dale hoped that he was rid of the man for all time, but he wasn't. Goff was not so confident as was Major Bradley that he could establish his innocence in the matter of the dynamiting of the two buildings and the trestle. He wished very much to steer clear of arrest, for reasons of his own, and he was biding his time in a little town in western North Carolina. When the dynamiting affair had blown over, he would go back and try again, perhaps by an altogether new scheme, to get himself into possession of the Moreland coal.

Then there came to the neighborhood a man whom no Moreland, and none of the Littlefords, had ever set eyes upon before. He was a very uncouth mountain man, with long black hair and shaggy beard; his clothing was outlandish and ragged. He had not much to say; there was about him, somehow, an air of mystery.

Two days after his arrival, in the afternoon, the stranger met Dale midway between the Halfway switch and the opening of the coal vein, and stopped him with an unpraised hand.

"Do you know good coal when ye see it?" he drawled.

"Why?" asked Dale, on his guard.

The stranger looked sharply in all directions, as though he wished to make sure that no person was within earshot of them. Evidently satisfied, he drew from a trousers pocket a shining black lump of coal, which he held out for Dale's inspection.

"What do ye think o' this here?" he wanted to know.

Dale took the lump and examined it closely. It was apparently as good as the Moreland coal, which had sent the expert Hayes into raptures. Dale then looked closely at the stranger. He appeared to be honest; his gaze was steady, and seemed very innocent.

"What Do Ye Think o' This Here?" He Wanted to Know.

"Where did you get this?" Dale asked.

The alert eyes narrowed. "Do ye think this here vein you're a-fixin' to mine is the only vein in the whole country?"

"Where did you get this?" Dale repeated.

"Do ye think," drawled the other, "'at I'm plumb fool enough to give my find away fo' nothin'? I been pore all o' my life, mister!"

"How am I to know," frowned Dale, "that you've really got a find?"

"Ye'd believe yore own two eyes, wouldn't ye?"

"Yes," Dale agreed, "I'd believe my own two eyes, of course. What's your name, and where are you from?"

"What do I git outen it? I don't own the mountain it's in, but it shore can be bought fo' fifteen cents a acre. And nobody knows about it but jest me. It lays closer to the railroad 'an this here Moreland vein, too. What do I git outen it, mister?"

The mountaineer seemed more honest than ever, but Dale was still on his guard. He asked again:

"What's your name, and where are you from?"

This time the answer came readily: "My name it's Walt Turner, and I'm from Turner's Laurel, Madison county, state o' Nawth Ca'liner. But my find it ain't nowhars clost to home. 'Tain't no more'n about two hours o' walkin' from right here, mister. Ef you'd jest up and go along wi' me, I'd show it to ye."

Dale considered. There might be a considerable vein of this new coal. Even if he was sent to the state penitentiary for a term of years, Hayes was entirely capable of carrying on the mining operations.

"I'd like to take my mining man, Hayes—"

"No!" quickly objected Walt Turner. "I don't want nobody else to know whar it's at but jest you and me. That away, ye see, ef I'm treated crooked I'll know edzactly who done it—and I'll shore git you! But I heerd tell' at you was pow'ful square, mister."

"Could I get back here before nightfall?"

Turner's eyes lighted. "Shore!"

"Then lead the way," ordered Dale.

Walt Turner from Turner's Laurel, Madison county, state of North Carolina, crossed the little creek on stones and went straight to the northeast, missing the Ball settlement by a good mile, and hard on his heels followed the Moreland Coal company's stalwart general manager.

The way was exceedingly rough. The two men climbed rugged cliffs, threaded dense thickets of great laurel, mountain laurel, sheep laurel, and huckleberry bushes. They were one hour in a stretch of woods where the hemlocks, poplars and hickories stood so thickly that the interlacing branches overhead shut out completely the light of the sun and half the light of day. Fearing a panther, or a wildcat, Dale kept his revolver loosened and ready in its holster. Walt Turner armed himself with a long staff—for snakes, he said; and then he proved it by killing a rattler that had eight rattles to its tail.

But they traveled rapidly, notwithstanding the fact that the going was difficult; and two hours after the beginning of the little journey Dale saw before him a small and almost circular, level-bottomed basin walled in by low cliffs. A small creek ran through this basin and made two easy ways of entrance. In the hollow they saw clumps of laurel and huckleberry bushes, and wild grasses knee-high; toward the center stood a solitary big and gnarled black walnut tree.

They entered at the point at which the creek ran in, and went to the walnut tree. There Turner halted and faced Bill Dale with a peculiar glint in his eyes. Dale was looking at the rugged walls of stone, and at the thick green forest that rose above them; he was marveling, as only a true lover of beauty can marvel, at the wonderful grandeur of it all.

Walt Turner, of Turner's Laurel, opened his slit of a mouth and spake, "Here's the kitty!"

Dale was brought out of his enjoyment most rudely. From behind clumps of laurel and huckleberry bushes, from the tall grasses, from everywhere—it seemed from nowhere—there sprang dozens of Balls and Bill Dale Had Walked, as Gently as a Kitten, Straight Into a Trap.

Torreys with rifles in their hands. Bill Dale had walked, as gently as a kitten, straight into a trap.

His right hand moved toward the butt of his revolver, then dropped at his side. It was foolish, worse than useless, to show fight; dozens of rifles were staring at him with their frowning, murderous eyes, and their bullets would riddle him if he showed fight. He glanced toward Walt Turner, kinsman of the Balls.

Turner was laughing openly. "Pore little kitty!"

FARM BUREAU DRIVE BRINGS MANY MEMBERS

Community Club Benefit Play Draws Large Crowd

Crowded House Enjoys Home Talent Play Last Friday Evening

CLUB CLEARS NICE SUM

"A Cheerful Liar" certainly lied cheerfully last Friday evening when the Community Club benefit play was given at the opera house before a audience which completely filled the building. Despite the rainy weather the crowd turned out to see the show and the universal comment was complimentary.

All the actors handled their parts well and some of them especially were good. C. M. Morse handled his part of the constable very well, and furnished numerous laughs to the crowd. Cato Griesy had the heavy part, an unusually heavy one, and he is to be complmented upon the way in which he managed his car and carried it thru. His part was too long for one character in an amateur play, and indeed, one of the actors of "Montana" which showed here on Saturday evening stated that he had played in the same play for three years and he considered it too heavy for an amateur organization.

Miss Albert Pierce was good, and handled her lines in nice shape, as did Mrs. Goelz and Mrs. White, both of whom had difficult parts. "Matt" in the role of a southern gentleman was as good as his mustache, which was all there. J. S. White carried his part thru nicely, in fact they all were good, and gave the audience the worth of their money.

The Community club realized about one hundred and fifty dollars from the play, and considering the work that it took to put it on they earned every cent of it.

Josephine Freil McAlpine trained the troupe and she is to be congratulated upon her sucess with them.

TWO CARS COLLIDE

Last week Friday evening about six o'clock Mrs. Ralph Christie, going west on Main street, and Chris Sorenson going north on River Avenue met at the intersection of the streets and the cars smashed together. The Christie car had one front wheel and fender broken, and was other wise damaged, and the Sorenson car was damaged to a slight extent. Mrs. Christie was accompaned by Mrs. Sloan and children, and was on her way home. She expected the other car to slow down but each seemed to be expecting the same thing and as a result the cars collided. No one was injured.

WANT ANY TURTLE SOUP?

Last week among other things that went out by express from here, was a shipment of turtles, two full barrels of 'em, mud and snapper, taken from the Iowa river north of town and consigned to a firm in Philadelphia. Honus Thompson was the shipper, and he receives eight cents a pound for the fish—or are they fish? When they get to the Quaker City doubtless some after-the-show party will put up 80 cents a gargle for the stew of the snappers.

CLARMOND CLUB HAS BIG HALLOWE'EN PARTY

The members of the Clarmond Country club held a very enjoyable Hallowe'en party at the clubhouse on Monday night of this week, the affair being a masquerade ball, and to judge from the reports those present had a regular time. Some of the costumes displayed were amusing to the highest degree, and several of the Clarion mmbers are reported to hav staged a "band concert" which brought down the house. A large number were present and every report is of the best time ever.

COUNTY CLUB RALLY IS GREAT SUCCESS

In spite of the miserable weather and the poor road conditions, the Wright county farm bureau held a most successful rally of all girls' clubs at Clarion last Saturday, October 29th. Every girls' club in the county was well represented and judging from all reports everyone had a most enjoyable time. The success of the rally was due in a large measure to the untiring efforts put forth by the members of the various committees and the rural teachers of the county, all of whom seemed to accept the responsibility of making it a success.

The members of the board of directors of the Farm Bureau and the County Agent hereby express their appreciation of the kindness and the splendid co-operation shown by Mr. W. F. Smith, manager of the Colonial Theatre who so willingly offered his theatre for the entertainment of the youngsters. Indeed, Mr. Smith made a special effort to entertain the girls of the county by arranging for a special photoplay entitled "Sweet Lavender," a comedy in five parts. Two reels showing the different processes in the manufacture of lace and one reel showing the various methods used in the manufacture of chinaware, also several slides illustrating the appropriatenes of dresses for school girls were secured from the Extension department at Ames. A vote of thanks is hereby extended by the officers and members of the girls' clubs of Wright county to Mr. Smith and his operator.

Miss Margery Hilton, director of music in our public schools, was in charge of the song fest which preceeded the running of the different reels. The singing of the club songs seemed to add enthusiasm and momentum to the meeting and it may well be said that the music was the life of the club rally.

The entertainment in the theatre was followed by a luncheon served in cafeteria style in the parlors of the M. E. church where members of the various clubs entertained their parents and members of the baord of directors of the farm bureau. This mid-feast was followed by a short talk by Mr. Harry Sumners, president of the farm bureau, who was followed by Miss Hazel Spencer, leader of the girls' club work in Wright county. Miss Cloe Jenison of Pleasant township told briefly of her experiences as a member of the girls club when the club work first began in Wright county, a few years ago. Miss Josephine Arnquist, state leader of girls club work then followed with a most interesting address on the various phases of girls club work, and the great responsibility which lay before the girls of Wright county. All credit for the success of the rally feast should go to county superintendent Blanche Bock and Mrs. Anna Overbaugh, who worked so faithfully and planned so successfully the decorations of the dining room and the method of serving about one hundred people who partook of this sumptuous dinner. The spirit of co-operation on the part of the officers of the M. E. church in throwing open their doors for this occasion was greatly appreciated by the officers of the Wright County Farm Bureau, also the leaders and members of the girls clubs of the county.

On account of the lack of time the play tournament which was to have been lead by Miss Violet Lukens was omitted and the girls club stunts lead by Miss Thora Larsen of Eagle Grove was next on the program. Clever stunts illustrating parlimentary laws in conducting meetings and the initiation of members into the club were given by the girls themselves. The program closed with the awarding of the premiums by Harry Sumners, president of the Farm Bureau.

COMMUNITY WELFARE CLUB

The meeting of the Community club held last Friday was a big sucess. Over one hundred women were present to see the demonstration of making dress forms by Mrs. A. E. Martin. These forms are so inexpensive and so serviceable that nearly every woman in the community is planning to make one.

Refreshments were served and a good social time was enjoyed by all.

ONLY FOUR MORE DAYS

NEW subscribers may secure the Independent one year for one dollar up to the 7th of this month—after that it will be the same price as before: two dollars per year.

We made this offer for one simple reason: To gain circulation and to obtain the extra money which we expected it to bring in. At one dollar the publisher loses money on very subscription; the postage in a year will be more than that. We have been making large gains in circulation thru this offer, as high as fifteen new supscriptions a day, and while we lose in some ways we gain in others.

If we secured these subscriptions thru an agent, we would have to allow the agent a commission for his work. We are simply giving the subscriber this commission by dealing direct. You have FOUR MORE DAYS to get the Belmond Independent ONE YEAR FOR ONE DOLLAR. And you must be a NEW subscriber.

We want to play fair with those subscribers who have been on the Independent lists so long, however, and we are making them the following offer, which holds good to December 1st:

We will accept RENEWALS, to be dated whenever the subscription expires, at ONE DOLLAR FIFTY CENTS, CASH.

A store puts on a bargain day, and sells you articles which the day before and the day after are sold at other and higher prices. That is exactly what we are doing—putting on a "bargain time when you can "shop" to advantage. Take advantage of the opportunity and "do your shopping" at the Money-Saving prices. Renew your subscription at the bargain rate of one fifty, or subscribe for yourself, your son or daughter, or for a friend, at one dollar. The Independent speaks for itself; it is an ALL HOME PRINT newspaper that gives the news of the home town.

LEWIS WENDEL

Lewis Wendel was born Dec. 25, 1861 at Dorchester, Allamakee Co., Iowa, and died at his home in Nora Springs, Iowa, Oct. 26, 1921.

On March 19, 1885, Mr. Wendel married Miss Emily Riser of Lansing, Iowa, and to this union five children were born, Roy J. of Clarion, Iowa; Gertrude Blanche Tanner of Rupert, Idaho; Mrs. Nora Luella McKinsey of Rupert, Idaho; Leona M. of Cedar Falls, Iowa; and Mildred M. of Rupert, Idaho. Mrs. Wendel died on March 25, 1918

On Nov. 10, 1920, Mr. Wendel married Mrs. Marrilla Werts.

Mr. Wendel came to this community in 1881 and it has been his home until last spring when he moved to Nora Springs, Iowa. Last June his health began to fail but it was not thought to be of a serious nature until about six weeks ago he was taken to Mason City and operated on when it was found that he had an internal cancer which could not be removed. Since that time he has been rapidly going down until on last Wednesday death relieved him from the suffering of the flesh.

Besides the wife and five children, he leaves two brothers, Geo. of Mason City and John J. of Lansing, Ia., and two sisters, Mrs. Matilda Trayer of Lansing, Iowa, and Mrs. Amelia Frederick of Detroit, Minn. Another sister died just six weeks ago.

Mr. Wendel was a hard working, industrious, honest and upright man. He was a member of the Mystic Workers of the World and also of the Modern Woodmen of America.

The body was brought from Nora Springs on Friday afternoon and the funeral services were held in the Congregational church on Saturday afternoon and were conducted by the pastor who had been personally acquainted with Mr. Wendell for over 40 years.

COUNTY TREASURER PREPARING TO REPLENISH LOCAL FUNDS

County Treasurer Allen for the past several days has been busily engaged in comuiling his annual report in order that he may dispense money due to municipalities and school districts. Public finances are in good condition. There are, of course, objectors to the rates of taxation. The action of taxpayers in a neighboring county who have petitioned for the suspension of one office for two years to reduce expenses is attracting attention. Little complaint is heard, however, regarding local officers and employes, all of whom seem to be endeavoring to earn their salaries.

SCHOOL NOTES

Division One of the Literary society gave a Hallowe'en program Friday afternoon. There were many visitors present. All seemed to appreciate the spook drill, reading and music. The trombone solo by Mr. Cruetzmacher was especially enjoyed.

The Sophmore girls challenged the Freshman girls to a basket ball game, which was played after school Friday evening. The Sophomores made good their challenge, winning by a score of 30 to 11.

Monday night at five o'clock the Sophomore boys challenged the Senior boys in basket ball. It was a hard fought battle, but the Sophomores finally won 9 to 7.

Declamatory practice starts this week.

Normal Training club met Saturday evening. Only twelve members were present, as the rain prevented many from getting here. Miss Bock could not get over, so we shall expect her some other time. The evening was spent in discussing teaching problems. Popcorn balls and apples were served by the refreshment committee.

Saturday evening the Sophomore class had a masked Halloween party in the gymnasium. Many of the maskers had very clever costums. The evening was delightfully spent playing hallow'een games.

Season athletic tickets are $1.25, and are good for six games. Tickets are good until used up and will be accepted for both basket ball and base ball games. They will not, however, be valid to tournament games should one be held in Belmond this year.

Our teams are working hard and will play real ball this year. Boosters will materially aid in winning games. Back the team. Buy a ticket. Single admission will be 25c and 35c. Write your name in INK on face of the ticket.

B. H. S. plays former stars Thursday November 3. Double header. Those having tickets admitted free. General admission 25c.

The high school orshestra under the direction of Mr. Grueczmacher is slowly rounding into shape and will give a good account of themselves before the year is over.

Ten new pupils have entered during the past two weeks in the lower grades.

Mrs. Clare Christie and Mrs. Corri Fitts and son Orvis were Kindergarten visitors Friday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Schooler moved their household goods the first of the week to a house on the Sugar company grounds.

OVER 4,000 NEW MEMBERS ARE REPORTED

One Day Drive For New Members By Farm Bureau Brings Fine Results

ALL COUNTIES NOT IN

Many Counties Yet To Be Heard From Will Swell Total Number

With returns far from complete the indications are that the one-day membership drive by the Farm Bureau brought in between 3,500 and 4,000 new members. Only about sixty counties have reported so far. Of these Dickinson took the lead with 126 new members. This makes Dickinson the banner county of the state, more than 100 per cent to the good, with 1085 farms and 1115 farm bureau members.

Preliminary reports from some other counties not yet checked up indicate that three or four of them deliver even more new members than Dickinson has reported. The estimate in Woodbury is 300 while Dubuque threatens to boost the former list to the extent of 500 new members.

Clay and Franklin counties scored 104 each. Linn reported 79. Hardin where the big drive was so successfully launched two years ago comes across with 72 new members. In the southern part of the state Union county is in the lead with 96. Adair follows with 70 and Jasper with 54. VanBuren 45 and Clarke 41 and so on down the list.

Considered in relation to existing conditions financial and otherwise all of which are more or less unfavorable to organization work it is an excellent showing for a single day's work and farm bureau members are generally entitled to congratulation.

THE MEANEST THIEF

We have read many stories of the meanest man and the meanest thief, who stole pennies from the baby's bank and made away with the Sunday school collection, but to our notion the king varmit of them all, the meanest and lowest polecate of them all, is the fellow who broke into the little home of Mrs. Pernell last week and stole a sachel containing some papers, including her marriage certifiate, some letters and a few dollars —three or four—and about a dollar and a half in dimes which she had managed to save from her labors. Mrs. Pernell, who is a widow, has fought nobly to support herself and take care of her needs by canvassing about town, working here and there and saving every penny, and the ignorant, concrete-hearted wretch who would break into her little home and steal the few dimes she had managed to lay aside is too crooked and mean to sleep with the hogs. Mrs. Pernell says she will be glad to let the thief keep the money if he will return the sachel and papers. She says that the theft is known by God and herself, but we question whether God has anything to do with animals of that low a character as the man who took her belongings. If he has a grain of conscience he will return everything he took, and leave something besides.

RUHL GETS $600 AND 60 DAYS

John Ruhl, former resident of the hill who was convicted last week in district court of maintaining a liquor nuisance, received his sentence last Friday and was given 60 days in the county jail and a fine of $600. On his promise that he would be good after serving his sentence, the judge, McCall, suspended the fine.

DISTRICT COURT GRIST

Monitor: The November term of the district court will convene at Clarion on the 28th, with Judge H. E. Fry of Boone presiding.

The jury list comprises seventy-five names, twenty ladies and fifty-five men

Those from this vicinity are as follows:

Rowan: Hattie Aldrich.

Belmond: C. Quandt, A. Mayhew, L. E. Titzell, Wm. Starnes, Jr., Jelto Benken, Joe Stadtlander, Guy Lynch, Maud Packard, Jessie Blake Goetz, Nels Fatland.

To the thirsty fellows of Wright county—take notice: That on the 28 day of October, A. D., 1921, at a regular session of the district court a most drastic order was given by one Judge McCall, to-wit: "The sheriff Wright county is herebby directed and ordered to destroy the liquors used as exhibits, with the vessels containing the same, and make a return of his performance of this order to the clerk of this court. Said judge also ordered all stills in the sheriff's custody to be demolished.

Two perfectly good copper stills and several dozen bottles of moonshine whiskey and "white mule" were included in the order. Sheriff Lang and Deputy Denger took the whole smear to the furnace room Monday and there in the presence of Clerk Goslin, Engineer Hilton and Janitor McGrath proceeded to carry out the judge's orders. As the foaming fluid went gurgling into the sewer the witnesses, collectively and each for himself, vowed such a waste was almost a crime and that the officers were no friends of theirs.

N. E. Hidy, the check forger, was given an indeterminate sentence of ten years at Fort Madison. His case was sent to the board of parole and it is probable a parole will be granted, as such action was recommended by both judge and county attorney. It being his first offense and the fact that a wife and three children were dependant upon him led the court officials to believe that society would be better served in allowing defendant a chance to redeem his past record.

Mrs. Nellie Tunnel, who was indicted by the grand jury on the charge of adultery, changed her plea of not guilty to that of guilty and was sentenced to serve 60 days in the county jail. Upon motion of county attorney sentence is suspended during good behavior owing to the defendent's physical condition.

John Ruhl of Belmond, whom the jury found guilty of selling moonshine liquors, was given sixty days in the county jail and ordered to pay a $600 fine. The jail sentence seems to disturb him the most.

The criminal case agains Herbert Bige and Roy Fortune have been continued upon request of county attorney. There are four indictments against them in connection with the robberies at Woolstock and Goldfield.

John Loux reported the finding of six auto tires in a straw pile on his farm in Wall Lake township to Sheriff Lang a couple of weeks ago. A grip belonging to Gerald Clark of Clarion was also among the loot.

H. A. Oakdale failed to defend suit on note brought by Independent Grain and Lumber Co. Judgement awarded plaintiff for $330. W. W. Frakes is given judgement against same defendant for $1678.

Hester J. Moon, by consent of defendant W. H. Anderson, is awarded judgement against him on his note for $3,278. Chapman Lumber Co. is also given judgement against this defendant for $1,486.

The court re-appointed D. W. Stewart of Clarion, J. H. Reese of Belmond and R. Richardson of Eagle Grove as collateral inheritance tax appraisers.

Lars Johnson vs. Sofie Johnson is a divorce case in which the wife failed to attend. The bonds of matrimony were declared severed.

Judge McCall adjourned court for a few minutes Thursday in order to tie a nuptial knot for Milo Madsen of Goldfield and Fannie Irish.

Judgement for plaintiff on account for $228.68 is entered in the case of Shally Baking Co. of Vinton vs. B. K. Kinseth of Belmond.

Manuel Lopez, who plead guilty to the indictment of adultery, is serving a six months' sentence in the county jail.

CHURCH NOTES

CONGREGATIONAL
Rev. S. U. Leinbach, Pastor.

We all enjoyed the splendid sermon by Rev. J. B. Adkins, field representative of our Iowa State Hospital. We were glad also to hear of the great work that the hospital is doing. More than 4,600 have been cared for in this institution during the four years of its history. It is a fine institution and is doing noble work. Miss Iva E. Trumbell, one of our Belmond girls, is the superintendent.

The ladies will meet with Mrs. Hattie Smith on Thursday afternoon to finish up the work for the bazaar. All who can possibly be present are urged to come. The bazaar will be held in the parlors of the church on November 10 and a good supper is guaranteed.

IOWA PRESS ASSOCIATION

HAVE THE UNIONS A RIGHT TO STRIKE?

The press is full of the threatened strike of the railroad workers, for what cause, a justifiable cause, no one seems to be able to tell. There is in the minds of most people a serious doubt as to the right of a strike by the railroad men. Legally they may have every right in the world, but morally have they?

It has always been, and probably it always will be, the history that when a man or an organization becomes powerful, they abuse their power. The railroad unions have done more in the past three years to injure the cause of organized labor in the minds of the American people than the capitalists could have done in a campaign of ten years.

When a body of men, organized for the purpose of obtaining justice, deny that same thing to as hundred million people, it is time that they were shown "where to head in at." If the public is entitled to anything it is entitled to decent transportation and at decent rates. The railroads of America have never been noted for what they gave the public, and this has always been one of the main points in the unions' arguments. If the unions are to follow in the same footsteps of the railroads, ad say "the public be damned," then they may expect the same sentiments to be estertained for them by the public as the public has held for the railroads.

To tie up the transportation facilities of the country at a time when winter is approaching is nothing more or less than an attempt to force the granting of their demands by bringing the fears of the public to bear on the other party. And it is said that only one-fourth of the men are in favor of striking, that the other three-fourths are against it. If this is the case then the government should see why one-fourth can rule three-fourths and place a hundred million people in danger and discomfort.

WHAT GRAVEL WILL DO

If anybody in thas vicinity wants an example of what gavel will do in the way of making a real road, let them drive down and take a ride over and a look at the road that has been made from one of the worst stretches of mudholes and chuckholes in the county.

What used to be a ride-the-ocean wave and chew-your-cud conglomeration of ups and downs and side swipes has been turned into a fine level road where the limit is the speed of your car. This piece of graveling is one of the finest that has come to the notice of the Independent in many a mile, and the county officials as well as the parties who graded and graveled it, are certainly to be complimented upon the splendid improvement that has been made. And this road, we venture to say, was graveled at a cost of about one-third to one-half what it would have cost to pave the road. And if, after you have ridden over it, you do not say that it serves the purpose as well as paving, then you must be hired by the cement trust.

A very noticeable thing this past week has been the difference between the roads that are graveled and the roads that are not. It is one of the greatest arguments in favor of the graveled highway. As an example, take the Solsburg to Clarion road, which has been graveled this summer. Taking what was there to begin with, and considering the excellent result that has been attained, there is really no argument left.

Last week a stove was advertised for sale in the Independent. By the time the paper had been in the mails 24 hours there had been seven replies to the ad. Does advertising pay?

We respectfully submit to the city authorities the state of the pavement on the south end of 4th Avenue S. E.

Belmond needs a new opera house. Not right now; the money can be used other places to better advantage; but later on, it ought to be one of the improvements considered.

GRAIN GROWERS SOLICITORS NOW AT WORK IN STATE

Ten solicitors, each trained in the principles of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., are now at work in Story county introducing this new cooperative endeavor to the farmers and co-operative elevators of that county, following a three day school of instruction held at Nevada last week. As soon as the initial campaign has been completed additional solicitors will be secured and the work carried to other surplus grain producing sections, A. L. Middleton of Eagle Grove state director, announced at the close of the school.

T. A. Hougas of Des Moines, former president of the Farmer's Union in Iowa, will assist Mr. Middleton in conducting the campaign as will A. W Carver of Muscatine with years of experience in the cooperative elevator movement. Mr. Carver has been traveling over the state with the state director during the past few months speaking on behalf of the U. S. Grain Growers and he reports as eagerness on the part of farmers to affiliste with this new company.

The cooperative elevators will be asked to sign a contract agreeing to deliver the grain of all members to the sales department of the U. S. Grain Growers. This involves no financial transaction The farmers will be asked to sign a growers contract and pay $10 for a life membership. The farmer is given the reality five different methods of disposing of his grain. The popular method to date has been the direct sales method in which the grower disposes of his grain in the same manner as in the past except that the ultimate sale is made through the U. S. Grain Growers rather than the present channels. The farmer receives a check to cover the prevailing market price for his grain when it is delivered to the elevator.

Reports from farm leaders in Story county at the start of the membership campaign, bristle with optimism. They state farmers there are ready to accept the new movement.

The securities offered will have a wide popular appeal and will be placed on sale thruout the country in convenient form. Early this Wednesday morning while Henry Africa Jr. and Louis Africa were autoing to the lakes to hunt they run the former's car into an open culvert east of the Pete Benson farm residence and while the car was damaged considerably the boys were uninjured. The car passed over the culvert opening and plowed thru the dirt which had been thrown up on the opposite side, damaging the front wheels, axle, radiators and fenders. No danger signals were up and the ditch could not be seen in the twilight until they were upon it, and it certainly was fortunate that the accident did not prove more serious. Had they been running at high speed the car would no doubt have turned over.—Kanawha Reporter.

What chiefly is needed in the church is a new sense of loyalty to our local church organization, to our Congregational heritage, to our missionary societies and workers, and to the great Head of the Church Whose we are and whom we serve, and this is the cry of every denomination, is a "New Sense of Loyalty."

LEGION MEN HERE INVITED TO MASON CITY CELEBRATION

Members of the local post of the American Legion are invited to attend the big Armistice day celebration at Mason City, according to word received by this paper from the committee in charge of the affair. The celebration is to be staged inconjunction with the football game between Charles City and Mason City high schools, both of them undeated. The championship of North Iowa will be at stake, unless the unforseen happens.

Though the courtesy of the Mason City high school authorities,, all Legion members will be admitted free to the game, providing they march in the monster parade, which will form at the Armory at 1:15 p. m. on Nov. 11. This will be led by a group of soldiers representing all of the allies and carrying all the allied flags, with Old Glory on the right. Three or four bands will be in the march and at least a half dozen fraternal orders, some in full regalia.

For an hour before the game, a military program under the directions of the Mason City post will be put on. A formal guard mount and a tug of war between a picked team from the Mason City post and one from some other (probably Charles City) will be two of the several features. In the evening a great military ball will be held at the Armory.

Mason City's service men are hoping that buddies from every nook of the surrounding country will join them in making this Armistice day celebration a whopper.

WHO MAKES THIS TOWN?

It isn't any one man, or any half dozen, or dozen. It is every person in the town, as well as those who make a practice of coming to the town.

We have citizens who are so modest and retiring that they imagine their influence is of no value, or has no weight—that it makes no difference to the town what they do or not do. They are mistaken.

We have become so accustomed to the progressive citizen that we expect to hear from him on any subject of any importance. We would be more or less nonplussed if he did not come to the front. But it is the action of the quiet and retiring element that adds impetus and puts real life into a movement for civic improvement. They may not assume to be leaders, but when they get behind and push the weight is so great there is no such thing as a permature halt.

Little wavelets, lapping up on the seashore, always precede the great tidal wave that sweeps everything before it. It is so in the community life. In each community there are a few who are always promptly active in every good movement. They are the little waves that never rest, that are ever creeping upon the beach, advancing and receding, incessantly on the move until they create the great wave of public sentiment that moves irresistibly on to victory and achievement.

It is the mass of quiet citizens who constitute the bulk of that public sentiment. It is the citizen who possibly thinks that his own individual opinion has but little influence upon community life. It is the one who acts after others have talked. You therefore, are one of the number who make this town. You are expected to aid in making it even a better town. You can do it if you will.

RURAL CARRIER EXAMINATION

The United States Civil Service commission has annouced an examination for the county of Wright to be held at Clarion and Eagle Grove on December 10 1921 to fill the position of rural carrier at Belmond.

The salary of a rural carrier on a standard daily wagon route of 24 miles is $1,800 pe annum, with an additional $30 per mile per annum for each mile or major fraction thereof in access of 24 miles. The salary on moto routes ranges from $2,450 to $2,600 per annum, according to length. Separate examinations for motor routes and wagon routes are no longer held. Appointments to both positions will be made from the same register. The examination will be openly only to citizens who are actually domiciled in the territory of a post office in the county and who meet the other requirements set forth in Form 1977. Both men and women, if qualified, may enter this examination, but appointing officers have the legal right to specify the sex desired in requesting certification of eligibles. Women will not be considered for rural carrier appointment unless they are the widows of U. S. soldiers, sailors or marines, or the wives of U. S. soldiers, sailors or marines who are physically disqualified for examination by reason of injuries received in the line of military duty.

FORD'S PLAN TO FIRE RAIL STOCKHOLDERS

Chicago News: Henry Ford is now telling how to run the railroads. Writing in the current number of the official publication of the chamber of commerce of the United States, Mr. Ford says, first of all, he would get rid of the individual stockholders, whom he considers a parasite; then he would turn to the lighter rolling stock and finally "fire the usless employes, especially the lawyers." Finance as it applies to railroads, says Mr. Ford, is a failure and the roads spend money uselessly in red tape of all kinds, particularly in accounting.

"The real purpose of a railroad," Mr. Ford writes, "is to serve the public. There is no reason why it should be diverted from that purpose and set to doing an entirely different thing—putting money into the pockets of stockholders who make no contribution to the road's actual operation. In the end the public pays these dividends. They are a tax on the whole people.

"There is a possible and practical system of fisancing railroads by which those contributing the money will be in positions to aid directly to the success of the undertaking. If the brakeman on a railroad owns stock in it he has an additional inducement to competent service. If the railroad is a success it is due to him and his fellow workmen, and they are entitled to the profit.

"Railroads should not have to go to banks for money They can be otherwise financed. The first thing is to make a railroad work. Make it possible for people to use it as much as they want to. Then there will be no trouble about finances.

"Of course, if such a course were attempted we could expect a great outcry for the protection of invested capitl. It would be said that people had bought these stocks for the financial protectios of their families, their children. Protection from what? From the necessity of earning their living. Their children would be better off if they had to finance them selves.

"After removing this dividend drain the second step would be to remove the great physical burden of the railroad's needless weight in its rolling stock. A freight train is several times the weight of the load it carries, and a passenger train is twenty times as heavy. The cost of pulling empty trains is needlessly large. Contrast this with the efficiency of the bicycle which weighs twenty pounds and will carry a man who weighs 200

"On the Detroit, Toledo & Iroston the old types of engine and car will be displaced by better types. Our patests will guarantee the free use of ideas. We will never proceed against anybody for infringement of our patents. They will belong to the world.

"The third step, an immediate step which should be taken in the operation of any great railroad system, would be that of expediting the journey of the freight carrier. By speeding up our freight over the preliminary part of its journey the D. T. & I. we have been able to shorten the time of its journey by periods ranging from seven to fourteen days. This means that our products gets to the people to whom we sell it from seven to fourteen days quicker than it used to. It means that we carry on our books $30,000,000 less undelivered product."—Published by request.

FARM BUREAU NEWS

BOOST THE FARM BUREAU

Every agricultural community has its "doubters", its "chronic kickers" and "pessimists," those who can prophesy how soon the agricultural interests of the community will be on the rocks. Occasionally we hear of some fellow, who has contracted a severe case of grouch thru natural causes or by reading some propaganda which has been printed in some newspaper or agricultural publication. This type of man claims that he has never gotten his money out of the farm bureau, that he has never seen any good it has done and that it costs too much.

Peder Pederson, known to every Wright county farmer said: "Even if we had done nothing more than prevent some things from happening the farm bureau would have more than paid for itself thru these savings." To what savings did he refer? The daylight savings law that cost the Iowa farmer, who hired help, a good many times $5.00 per year. The proposed Nolan bill, if ever allowed to become a law, would exact from $200 to $400 additional tax on every Iowa farm annually.

The legislative accomplishments of the American farm bureau federation in the last session of our national congress is sufficient proof that the federation has been on the job and looking after the farmers' interests. It will be remembered that when congress adjourned last August it had seven agricultural bills to it credit. These have all been signed by the president of the United States and are now laws of the land. Senator Kenyon and Representative Dickinson, both from the good old Iowa turf, are the leaders of the agricultural blocs in the senate and house and we should honor them for the stands they have taken in the interest of agriculture. The agricultural bills as passed were:

1. Packer and stock yards bill.
2. Capper-Tincher bill for regulation of grain exchanges.
3. Extension of war finance corporation.
4. Increase rate interest on federal farm loan bonds from five to five and one half per cent.
5. Increase by $25,000,000 working capital of federal farm loans.
6. Limiting immigration to 2 per cent foreign born on 1910 census.
7. Emergency tariff bill.

ATTEMPT TO SPLIT BLOC UNSUCCESSFUL

All efforts to disrupt the senate agrarian bloc proved futile when seventeen members met in the capital last Saturday night and decided to carry the war into the enemy's camp by serving notice upon the senate finance committee that one of its subcommittees had persistantly refused to consider and report out a bill for liberalizing farm credits, and failing to get action, to move in the senate for the dismissal of the committees.

The bloc also appointed a committee of Senators William J. Harris, Peter Norbeck and Wm. S. Kenyon to call upon the federal farm loan board to speed up loans on farmers' applications. The senators will also ask the farm loan board to do all possible in promoting the sale of farm loan bonds. This action was taken after considerable criticism of the board because of the lethargy shown in administering the act for maximum benefit of agriculture.

WANT CAPPER-VOLSTEAD BILL

The bloc's program calls for the enactment of the Capper-Volstead cooperative marketing bill and the Kenyon bill for the appointment of a Federal Reserve Board.

In opening the meeting Chairman Kenyon of Iowa told the senators that he did not consider it improper as has been intimated for a group of congressmen interested in agriculture and its welfare to meet and discuss pending legislation and lay plans for its proper advancement. He considered the meeting a success and there was plenty of evidence that the bloc is not "dead" but more enthusiastic and active than ever, actually gaining in strength, influence and membership.

SET DATES FOR CONVENTION

The third annual convention of the Iow Farm Bureau Federation will be held in Des Moines, January 11-12, 1922. The time was made one week later than the date of the last convention in order to give the county organizations more time for perfecting arrangements to attend, following their meetings the first week in January. The opening session will be given up largely to reports of committees and other details summing up activities of the year. After that there will be music and addresses by men prominent in Federation work. Program will be announced at an early date

INFLUENCE HELPED RATE REDUCTIONS

Producers and snippers of grain, grain products and hay in all states west of Chicago, will experience considerable relief thru the freight reductions recently ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The order will go into effect not later than Nov. 20 and applies to all the western half of the U. S. Reductions on wheat and hay amount to seventeen and one-half per cent while the cut on rye, oats, millet and corn is about 29 per cent.

Considerable disappointment follows the order because it has to do only with interstate rates and does not apply to shipments within states. However, it is a beginning and the belief is general that the order has opened the way for an early reduction of interstate tariffs, as well as further reductions on interstate hauls. In some quarters the opinion prevails that the railroads themselves may decide to apply the cut to shipments within states.

A liberal share of credit for this order effecting such a large scope of territory should be given to the Iowa Farm Bureau federation and the Iowa railroad commission, both of which appeared at the August hearings conducted in Washington by the Interstate Commerce commission. The federation was represented by Sec. Cunningham and Dr. Nourse of Ames, while Dwight Lewis and Chas. Webster appeared for the railroad commission.

The testimony of Cunningham and Nourse was along lines so distinctly unusual, in presenting the claims for agriculture, that it amounted to an innovation. Their stand was rendered impregnable by the presentation of valuable data covering the cost of producing corn, oats and wheat in Iowa along with figures showing the general cost of farming operations under present conditions. This data was compiled by the federations' cost of production committee, and represents the results of the cost account ing projects carried on in 1920 and 1921 under the supervision of Dr. Nourse.

It was the only data of the kind submitted at the hearing. One other state presented a series of estimates covering the cost of producing grains, but as evidence it was not altogether outside the range of criticism. But the figures submitted by the Iowa Farm Bureau federation are absolutely beyond question. Their accuracy is unimpeachable, hence their value as testimony. They were so unusual that a lively attempt was made to discredit them, but in the end they were accepted and made a part of the records.

The question of intrastate rates is slated for an early hearing. Even tho the railroads should voluntarily apply the order from Washington to shipments within states the Iowa Railroad commission expects to conduct a hearing before long for there is still a vast amount of readjustment work to be done toward restoring a proper balance between different lines of industry.

ACHIEVING CIVILIZATION.

To achieve civilization a race must conquer itself and each individual must master the savage existing within him. The fact that we have not yet succeeded in doing this Doctor Mayer advances as the reason why cultured man have never civilized a primitive race. Under our domination, as is well known, the savage either dies or becmes a worthless parasite of a helpless slave.

RELIEVED OF $265 IN CASH, A DIAMOND RING AND AUTO

Garned Leader: Tuesday morning, Sheriff E. P. Hanson received a telephone call from Howard (Skinny) Hunt of Mason City, appraising him of the fact that he had been held up and robbed early that morning by three masked men and told the sheriff to be on the look-out for the thugs. Howard was formerly a resident of this place, but a little more than a year ago, he and his mother moved to Mason City. Since going to Mason he had been operating a taxi. He had his stand with the Redekkar cars on West State Street near Central Park in that city. Tuesday morning about 3:00 o'clock, Howard drove to his home in his Cadillac and when he arrived at his garage three men stepped from behind the building, and covered him with their guns. They ordered him back into his auto and forced him to drive them seven miles west on the south road to Clear Lake. When near Emery, they commanded him to stop and made him get out of his car. Some time prior to this they had releived Skinny of his diamond ring valued at $1400 and $265 in cash. As they drove away in his Cadillac they bade him good-bye and informed him that his car would be in Chicago in the morning. As soon as they had forced him to alight, they started down the road with the engine wide open. Howard's car had yellow wheels and a tan top. The initials H.H.H. at the top of the door on the driver's side. It is very probable that the car will be found abandoned somewhere along the line. One thing seems to be apparent and that is that the fellows who pulled this deal, were acquainted with Howard. They knew of his diamond ring, and that he was in the habit of carrying considerable cash about with him.

The loss to Mr. Hunt is a serious one but the affair could have terminated much worse. Men who will pull a stunt of this character are desperate and will do most anything to cover up their tracks. Had Howard not conformed to their demands in all things, it is more than likely that he would have been murdered. What passed through his mind while he was being piloted to the lonely spot near Emery where they left him we do not know, but imagine that all sorts of horrible acts occurred to him. We sincerely hope that the guilty parties will be apprehended, and that Howard will be able to retrieve his stolen property.

PAVING IS NOW ALL OPEN

Leader: The Henkel Construction Company has opened the balance of the paving between here and the county line east, and we can now travel from Garner to Charles City and be on paving practically all the time. The last mile and one-half was open ed Wednesday afternoon. This is one of the best improvements that has ever been made in this section of the state and Garner is on the longest continuous stretch of paving to be found in the state. And now is the time for Garner merchants to put forth an effort to have people who are accesable to the paving make this their trading point.

MAIL ORDER HOUSE READS COUNTRY PAPER

"We have a bureau whose duty it is to read each week the country newspapers from all over the country There is not a paper of any consequence in our trade territory that our bureau does not get. This bureau looks over these papers and when we find a town where the merchants are not advertising in the local paper we immediately flood that territory with our literature. It always brings results far in excess of the same effort put forth in territory where the local merchants use their local papers," said Herman Rosenfield, advertising manager for Sears, Roebuck & Co.

SHUCKING CORN NO VACATION; TRY IT, ALL YOU DOUBTERS

The corn husker!

This caption does not refer to that contrivance invented by man and drawn by six or seven horses, wonderful as that may seem. It is however, a very wasteful machine. Wasteful of power of lubricants of corn and for the amount of power used a very different machine as compared with the one we have in mind

We are thinking of the up to date corn picker of today, a young fellow, 16 to 25 years old, or it may be a young woman of the same age. There you have a wonderful machine and the more you watch one in action and note all the adaptations of this machine the more you will wonder and admire.

Consider what it means to husk 100 bushels of corn a day. Let us suppose that there are 130 ears big and little in the average bushel as the husker finds it. That means 13,000 ears and he has about ten hours of daylight in which to gather them. That would be 130 an hour, or 20 a minute, every one sees seconds on the average.

Almost anyone can husk an ear of corn in three seconds. It is the 12,999 that bother. And then those twelve thousand odd ears are in every conceivable position. Some are high, some are low, some on the ground, some leaning away over into the next row. In the morning they are often covered with white frost. Frequently they are on the muddy ground but the husker has only three minutes on the average to get any one of them and he has a lot of other things to do in between. He has to encourage his team to go or, worse yet to hold them back so he can keep up with them. And that bang! bang! bang! must be kept up and if he loses out for a minute or two he must make it up. As a matter of fact he does a lot better than one in three seconds.

If you will listen to one of them on a still, frosty morning you will hear an ear striking the bangboard about every other second for minutes at a time, and if you will think of the number of motions of fingers, wrists and arms necessary to seize an ear, get the husk off, break it from the stalk and throw it, without look or aim, into the wagon box 13,000 times a day with not one miss in a hundred you will admit that that is a wonderful machine. But that is not all. This machine is self oiling and self repairing over night and it does this on the energy developed from three or four pounds of fuel and possibly a gallon of water.

That is some machine, especially if it is of the feminine gender, and if we add to this the job of unloading the corn, that means tossing 8,000 to 9,000 pounds up three feet above one's head, then we surely can say tha man is wonderfully made.

And some of these machines will keep this up for 20 or 30 days with only Sundays off and they are at work as soon as it is light and they are still at it when it is dark that one cannot see ten rods ahead. Talk about athetics! They have the foot ball man skinned a mile when it comes to action. There is hardly a moment the whole day through that they are not changing position. It may be cold and windy and disagreeable but that bang goes on. The snow may come down but that corn must be gathered. So the machine keeps steadily at it until the last ear is in.

It is hard work. It is worth all he gets for wages; but it has its compensations also. The young fellow who tackles a big husking job and sticks to it is also training to tackle bigger jobs later on and the appetite he developes in picking 100 bushels would be the envy of many a millionaire.

Here's to the corn husker.

HELP YOUR LOCAL PAPER

Don't make fun of your local paper. It has possibilities of being as good as any in the country—and remember that it reflects the community in which it is published, and it is the one product that goes to far places bearing the town trade mark. It deserves the best you can give of active support and sympathetic understanding.

Give the editor news, wether it benefits you or not.

Don't ask him to print it on the front page and just the exact way you have handed it in.

Don't worry lest the editor makes too much money. If he's prosperous, he'll be foolish enough to give his community a better paper; that's an etitor's ambition—that's why he engages in the publicity business.

Tell him when he has a good paper You are willing to congratulate your preacher on a good sermon, and your merchant on an attractive window display. The editor is no less grateful for a word of praise.

Make it a point to visit the print shop and learn of its difficulties and complexities. At least that will give you more charitable attitude. The paper should not be the product of the editor solely, but of all those who are interested in it as friends, contributors readers or advertisers.—Southland Farmer.

GREAT EXCITMENT AT WALCOTT

Davenport, Ia., Oct. 25.—There is great excitement in the town of Walcott, twelve miles west of Davenport. For the first time in its history the community has a Sunday school. It started with 26 pupils.

Walcott is unique in its religious sentiments. It has not a single church, Catholic or protestant, and since the founding of the town, more than fifty years ago, its citizens have steadfastly refused to support or even tolerate religious services

Walcott is a town of fine homes, schools and banks. It recently erected a public auditorium where chautauquas and other educational affairs are held. Until a few years ago it had the distinction of being the wealthiest city per capita in the United States.

But the town doesn't want churches In years past, efforts have at various times been made to establish a mission or church in the place, but all have met with failure. The citizens simply boycotted all such movements and on Sunday mornings closed their doors and windows to the peal of church bells.

"We have always had peace, loyalty and order in our town without churches and we don't want this spirit disturbed," is the remark of a leading citizen expressing the community's opposition to the churches.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

CHAPTER VI.—To get proper surgical aid, John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Dale convey "Babe," unconscious, to the city. Doctors assure them she is not seriously hurt. Dale meets an old friend, Bobby McLaurin, who had married Patricia Clavering. Telling his father of David Moreland's coal, the old gentleman's actions convince his son of his father's guilt in the killing of Moreland.

CHAPTER VII.—It is arranged that "Babe" is to stay with Mrs. McLaurin to be educated. Dale, refusing his father's proffered financial aid to develop the mine, interests Newton Wheatley, capitalist, who agrees to furnish the money. Dale realizes he loves "Babe."

CHAPTER VIII. — Returning to the Halfway Switch, Dale meets Major Bradley, lawyer, and real friend of the mountaineers, whom he engages as counsel for the company. A man named Goff, of evil repute, tries to bribe Dale to betray the Morelands by selling him the coal deposits, and telling them they are of little value. Dale attempts to thrash him, but Goff draws a revolver. Dale is unarmed.

CHAPTER IX.—Goff enlists the aid of a turbulent crowd, the Balls and Torreys, to make trouble for Dale's company. The Littlefords and Morelands agree to forget the old feud and dwell in harmony.

CHAPTER X.—"Babe" returns to her home, fearing she is a burden to the McLaurins. Dale remonstrates, and she agrees to go back, for the sake of an education. Waylaid by "Black Adam" Ball, Dale fights a pistol duel with the desperado, and Ball is killed. Dale is arrested and taken to jail at Cartersville. He doesn't see how his shot could have killed Ball.

CHAPTER XI.—There is much speculation as to who really killed Ball, the general opinion being it was By Heck, who had constituted himself Dale's guardian.

CHAPTER XII. — Caleb Moreland, son of John Moreland, admits firing the shot which killed Ball, and takes Dale's place in jail. He is innocent, but takes the blame for the killing in order that Dale can continue the development of the mine.

CHAPTER XIII.—On the pretext of investigating another coal deposit, Dale is decoyed to a gathering of the Balls and Torreys. They "try" him for the murder of Adam Ball, find him guilty, and sentence him to be hanged next day. He is rescued by By Heck. Goff is forced to leave the neighborhood.

"If ever I have the chance," muttered Bill Dale, "I'll thrash you for this cute little joke of yours."

"You won't never have the chanst," laughed Walt Turner.

The Balls and the Torreys began to close in on all sides, and a solid ring of dark and for the most part bearded, wickedly triumphant faces formed itself around Dale. Adam Ball's father, the acknowledged leader of that band of cutthroats that was now the Ball-Torrey faction, glared at Dale with black eyes that were filled with the fire of intense hatred; then he seized Dale's revolver and thrust it inside the waist-band of his worn jeans trousers. Dale felt the grip of rough hands on his shoulders and arms. He fully realized his great danger; but he strove to keep all signs of fear out of his countenance, and he was not unsuccessful.

"I presume this is what you call taking the law into your own hands, isn't it?" he said with a smile that was forced.

"Edzactly!" snapped old Ball. "We ketched ye fo' the law, and we held ye fo' the law, and we turned ye over to the law; and 'en, by gonnies, the law turned ye loose the very next day! And 'en the shuriff he comes out here and arrests four o' us! Ef the law won't try ye and punish ye fo' a-shootin' my son Adam in cold blood, by gonnies, we'll try ye and punish ye fo' a-doin' it. But ye needn't be skeered none at all. Ye're plumb shore to git jestice. I'll promise ye jestice."

"You've evidently overlooked the fact that another man confessed to the killing, and that that was why they liberated me," said Dale.

"It's some cussed frame-up," snarled the leader of the gang. "No man on earth don't like no other man well enough fo' that. Asides, you're the one 'at killed my son Adam, by gonnies, and you're the one 'at must suffer fo' it. Right here onder this here warnut tree we're a-goin' to hold co'te and have yore trial, by jedge and jury, and you'll shore git what's a-comin' ——"

Bill Dale cut in with some bitterness: "And you'll be the judge, and your plans have already been laid, and I'm to be hanged by the neck until dead; eh? Well, you'll pay dearly for it, I promise you. We always have to pay for what we get, you know. The Morelands and the Littlefords will be quick to settle the account. You know that."

"No," old Ball disagreed hotly, "I don't know that!"

He turned to the others.

"Set down, boys. It's the same price as standin'. The jury will please set over thar," pointing to his right. "The pris'ner and his gyards will please set right over thar," pointing to his left. "The hon'rable jedge, which same is me, will please set right thar," indicating a spot at the base of the gnarled walnut. "The rest," he finished, "will set anywhar they d—n pleases. Set down, men."

His orders were obeyed. Dale found himself sitting on the ground between two pairs of mountaineers and facing a line of twelve mountaineers—the so-called jury. To his left was the self-appointed judge, and to his right lounged a score or more of men whose attention was then being turned toward a jug of fiery new whisky that had never been near to a revenue stamp or anything else that was honest. The jug traveled rapidly from one hairy mouth to another.

Old Ball passed the jug to a member of the "jury," and announced:

"Well, dammit, co'te's open now."

"Kitty, kitty, kitty!" taunted Walt Turner. "Pore little kitty!"

The mockery began. It was ridiculous, and yet it was grim. Adam Ball's father himself furnished most of the evidence; also he acted as prosecuting attorney. Of course there was no counsel for the defense, and it wouldn't have helped if Dale had had a proverbial Philadelphia lawyer on the grounds; all the proof and eloquence and pleading in the world never would have changed, in the slightest degree, the sentence that had been cut and dried for Bill Dale. The mock trial was being held solely because the Balls and Torreys felt that by holding it they were insulting the majesty of the law and making their vengeance sweeter. It became worse than a travesty. . . .

Night fell during the wordy and profane harangue of the Ball leader, and it was ordered that a fire be built at once. At once a fire was built, dry brushwood being used, and in its red and flickering glare the faces of the hillmen looked doubly dark and doubly wicked. Then the judge begged a chew of tobacco and deliberately kept the whole twist, and told the jury to go out and bring back a verdict without losing time.

The twelve mountaineers rose unsteadily and went to the creek, and there one of them uncovered another jug of fiery new whisky that was alien to a revenue stamp. They drank heavily and returned to the walnut tree court without mentioning the trial.

The foreman was a Torrey, and a particularly bad one. His swarthy face, with its high Cherokee cheekbones and its thin-lipped mouth, was ultra-cruel, ultra-vicious. He entered the circle of red and flickering firelight slowly, smiling evilly, and the other eleven crowded up close behind him. He cleared his throat, spat between two fingers at the fire, and turned to the judge.

"Gentlemen o' the jury," growled the ruling Ball, "have ye reached a verdict?"

"We have, yore honor," very promptly answered the Torrey who was foreman. "And we ha' found the pris'ner guilty o' the wust kind o' coldblooded, premeditated mudder in the fust degree, yore honor."

Old Ball leveled a knotty forefinger toward Bill Dale.

"Fo' the killin' o' my son Adam," he pronounced sentence, "you sh'll hang by the neck ontel dead, from a limb o' this here warnut tree, by gonnies, at sunrise in the mornin'."

Although he had well known what the sentence would be, Dale went suddenly ashen. Then he took a firm grip on himself and began to reason.

He could not hope, he decided, that the Morelands and the Littlefords would find him before the sun rose. They would miss him, of course, and they would suspect foul play and look for him; but finding him in that wilderness—it was impossible. It became plain to him that he would have to save himself if he were saved. He believed his best chance lay in his proving that he was anything but a coward; the worst mountaineer, he knew, admired a brave man.

So he turned slightly toward the self-appointed judge and asked calmly:

"Is there anything really game about you?"

"Shore, by gonnies!" quickly. "I'm all game. I'm the feller 'at showed wildcats how to fight. What about it?"

"I'll see if you're all game," Dale said, and he smiled when he spoke. "I'll make you this proposition: I'll fight any ten of you, two at a time, with five minutes' rest between fights; if I whip them all I go free, and if I don't whip them all I hang immediately. All parties to be barehanded, no guns and no knives. Are you that game?"

Ordinarily, it would have been a thing well nigh impossible to do, much as Dale knew of the pugilistic art, great as was his strength and endurance. But now most of those about Dale were drunk and therefore weakened, and he believed he had a chance if old Ball accepted.

But Judge Ball didn't accept. Doubtless he remembered his son Adam's fight with Dale.

"The' cain't be no fightin' in co'te," he said. "You sh'll hang by the neck ontel dead, at sunrise in the mornin'."

There was a mumble of approval from the others. Doubtless they, too, remembered that the young man whom they held a captive had once whipped Black Adam Ball, the mountaineer Goliath, with his bare hands. They did not have the one good trait that Dale had hoped they possessed; while they must have admired him for his courage, they were afraid to fight him without weapons. Dale recalled the fact that the Balls were not originally hillfolk, but lowlanders who had taken to the mountains in order to avoid being forced to fight during the Civil war, a people without a principle. The Cherokee Torreys, of course, were even worse.

"Kitty, kitty, kitty!" Walt Turner called tauntingly again. "He walked into the trap like a pore little kitty!"

A plowline of half-inch cotton rope was produced, and the condemned man was securely bound, standing on his feet and facing outward, to the big walnut. Desperate as was his case, Dale couldn't help being a trifle amused at that part of it. It was so very melodramatic. And yet, it was so grimly real, and his hopes seemed so thin. . . .

It Was So Very Melodramatic.

The Morelands and the Littlefords would eventually learn the truth and make the Balls and Torreys pay a dear price, no doubt, but that—that wouldn't give him back his life!

The men were divided into two watches. The first was to remain awake and on guard until midnight, and the other was to go on duty from midnight until dawn. The second watch, with which was the faction's leader, had a nightcap of the vitriolic whisky, flung itself sprawling on the ground and straightway went to sleep.

The first watch sat around the crackling brushwood fire and played cards for chews of tobacco, cartridges and pocket knives, sang strange and outlandish songs and drank more whisky. One very drunk Torrey gambled away all his tobacco, all his cartridges, his knife, his rifle and his belt, his coat and his hat, his boots and his shirt—and offered to bet his trousers and his ears on the turn of a single card! It was funny, and it was disgusting, too. It was all the work of whisky, which Bill Dale had always hated because it made men fools, made them mouth their secrets and made them commit murder. . . .

After some two hours of these worse than bacchanalian orgies the first watch, heavy with drink, stopped playing cards and singing outlandish songs, forgot all orders and began to nod. Then it was that Dale thought of the man who had been his faithful guardian for many days, the lanky By Heck. Why hadn't he thought of Heck before? He wondered if Heck had followed him to the trap, if Heck was near him even then, if Heck had gone for help.

By Heck had not followed Bill Dale to the little basin. But he had followed Henderson Goff, and Henderson Goff had followed Dale to the little basin. Goff had returned to the Big Pine Mountain country only that day and he knew nothing of the plans of the Ball-Torrey faction until he witnessed the mockery of a trial. Goff was now crouching in the darkness on the low line of cliffs to the eastward from the walnut tree; and not far behind him, well hidden in the black laurels, watching him and watching Bill Dale, crouched By Heck.

Dale's guardian had not gone for help, because he feared to leave Dale utterly unprotected in the hands of the gang of cutthroats. He believed that he could rescue Dale himself. When the first watch became a little more drowsy, he would steal up behind the tree and cut the cotton rope.

Then he realized that Goff had disappeared entirely. He crept forward silently, his eyes alert, and a moment later he saw Goff stealing toward the walnut tree. He climbed noiselessly down over the face of the cliff and followed Goff like a shadow. When Goff's hands touched the tree, By Heck was within ten feet of it. Heck made sure his rifle was ready and took another step forward, watching, listening.

The shyster coal man leaned around the tree to the left. In the glow of the low-burned fire the blade of a small knife in his hand gleamed dull red. He whispered cautiously:

"Youre in a fix, Dale. And it's none of my doing, either. Give me your word that I'll get that coal property for fifteen thousand, and I'll slash the rope. How about it? Sick of this country, aren't you?"

There came a few seconds of silence save for the lusty snoring of the sleepers and the musical tinkle of the little creek, after which Goff muttered disappointedly:

"Well, then, hang!"

And Heck knew that Dale had refused to sell the Moreland coal for a song even to save his life. As Goff stepped backward, the muzzle of the tall hillman's rifle went against the small of his back, and the tall hillman whispered hoarsely, through teeth tightly clenched:

"Slash 'at rope, d—n yore soul! Slash 'at rope, or I wisht I may drap dead ef I don't shoot yore backbone into four thousand pieces, igod! Slash it!"

Goff straightened in surprise. The rifle's muzzle went harder against his back and he knew it for exactly what it was. He moved a hand upward, then downward and the cotton rope was severed in half a dozen places.

"Stiddy thar, now!" whispered By Heck, and he began to back away. "Come along wi' me, ye dadslatted, banjer-bellied skunk. Bill he'll foller."

The three of them hurried into the deeper shadows. Soon Heck halted Goff and turned to Dale.

"S'arch him fo' a gun, Bill, old boy."

Dale lifted from Henderson Goff's right-hand coat-pocket a blued and stub-nosed magazine pistol.

"Dang my eyes and blast my forrard!" Heck exclaimed in a muffled voice. "He's plumb death on them little popguns, ain't he? Say, Goff, ef ever ye shoots me with a thing like that and I find it out, danged ef I don't spank ye ontel yore nose bloods; Now, le's go, you'uns. And ef ye jest cheep out a noise, Mister Goff, the buzzards will pick the meat offen yore bones afore tomorrer night."

"Move, shyster!" frowned Bill Dale.

By Heck led the way to the line of cliffs to the westward. They had climbed the rugged wall and were about to set out through the pitchy dark woodland, when a voice that they knew well hailed them softly from the laurels to their left:

"Hold on, thar!"

"John Moreland, by jiggers!" muttered Heck.

Moreland hastened soundlessly to them. "I reckon ye didn't mean no harm, By," he said in tones that expressed a deep regret, "but yit I shore wisht ye hadn't ha' done it."

Samuel Heck was very proud of himself. He straightened there in the darkness.

"What'n the name o' the devil makes ye wisht sech a thing as that, John?" he demanded in a half angry voice.

"'Cause," growled the big hillman, "you went and sp'lled h—l out o' the main big picnic. We meant to wipe out all o' them thar lowdown Balls and Torreys, By. When they went to hang Bill Dale in the mornin', we'd ha' had a good reason fo' a-killin' 'em everyone—the weasels! Ye see, By, every man Moreland but Caleb, and every man o' the Littlefords, is hid here in these laurels, and has been ever sense that thar fool trial begun. We was jest a-waitin'. How did we happen to know it?

"'At's easy, By. Me and Ben Littleford was on our way atter more dynamite, when we seed Bill Dale a-follerin' that stranger man, and Goff a-follerin' Bill, and you a-follerin' Goff. We knowed somethin' ongodly mean was in the wind. So I follered you, By, a-breakin' off bushes as I went to mark the trail, and Ben he went back and got the rest of 'em and follered me."

Then to Dale, "Well, Bill, what're we a-goin' to do with this here cussed polecat Goff?"

Dale turned to the shyster coal man, who was still being closely watched by Heck.

"I told you I was pretty apt to thrash you the next time we met, didn't I?" clipped Dale. "Do you want to get out of this country for good, or do you want to fight me to a finish? I'm through talking right now, Goff."

"I'd guess I'd rather fade," acknowledged Goff.

"Then fade!"

Goff slunk off through the brush.

When they had covered a mile, John Moreland grasped Dale by an arm and said to him:

"I reckon you think we're sort o' bloodthirsty, by us a-waitin' to kill off that pack back thar; don't ye? Well, we ain't blood-thirsty, Bill. Them Balls and Torreys ain't wo'th nothin' to theirselves, nor to their famblies, nor to nobody else. The sooner they're dead the better off they'll be, and the better off their famblies'll be, and the better off everybody else will be. You ain't safe, nor I ain't safe, as long as they're alive.

"We like you, Bill Dale," he continued gravely. "And you're shore wo'th it. You wouldn't sell out to that cussed polecat, even to save yore own life, and 'at's what I calls narve and principle in ye. Bill Dale, the' ain't many men in this here whole outfit who wouldn't give ye the last d—d drop o' blood in their bodies, ef ye needed it. To the right, Bill—ahead of us is a clift."

CHAPTER XIV.

A Letter and a Proposal.

The Moreland Coal company's two big rough buildings were completed in record time. There had been no further manifestations of interference from the Balls and Torreys, and Henderson Goff had been nowhere in evidence since the night of Bill Dale's ironclad verbal ultimatum. Work on the little railroad was progressing like wildfire, and everybody was in high spirits.

By Heck had just arrived with the mail. He stalked with an air of great importance into Dale's office, and threw the mail down on the new roll-top desk; then he stepped backward, dropped into a straight-back chair and began to nurse his rifle tenderly on his knees. There was a puzzled look on his leathery face. Dale had received half a dozen letters, and By Heck was at a loss to figure out the why of such an overwhelming amount of mail.

Dale finished his figuring, leaned back in his swivel chair and took up a letter that seemed altogether too bulky for a business letter. Moreover, its address was in pencil, and somewhat scrawled, though a chirography expert would have said that the handwriting showed strength of character.

"I wonder who it is," Dale muttered, "that mistakes us for a newspaper office and is sending us copy?"

"Jest what I was a-thinkin'," drawled By Heck through his Niagara

"Open Her Up, Bill, Mebbe It's Money, by Jake!"

Falls mustache. "Open her up, Bill; mebbe It's money, by Jake!"

Dale saw the postmark then, and his brows drew with interest. It was the postmark of his old home city.

"From Babe," he told himself—and it was.

He opened it and read it. She had spelled most of her words correctly, but the only punctuation she used was a period and her capitals were few. For a wonder, she had put it into paragraphs:

Mr. bill Dale.
cartersville.
tennessee.

Kind friend.

yores respectively.

Babe.

Bill Dale folded the bulky letter and put it slowly back into the envelope. Then his gaze wandered through a window and to where a golden-winged high-holer was hammering industriously at the top branch of a dead tree. He smiled to himself, By Heck and nearly all of the rest of the world for the moment forgotten, and muttered aloud:

"'Yores respectively, Babe.'"

"Haw, haw, haw!" laughed the keen-eared and watchful hillman in the straight-back chair behind him. "'Yores respectively, Babe!' Haw, haw, haw! Well. Bill, dadsling it, it shorely to goodness ain't nothin' to turn all that red about! When the night's gone the day comes, don't it? Bill, old boy, it's the same thing!"

"You get out of here, By!" Dale stormed in mock severity. "Go and help the commissary clerk with the new goods; eh?"

Heck laughed another horselaugh, rose and went out.

When he had gone, Dale began to think—of the ultra-spoiled, charming-after-a-fashion, wealthy, young, high-night devotee, Jimmy Fayne. And he wondered, and wondered, what would come of Fayne's quick liking for Babe Littleford.

After he had viewed the matter from above and below and all sides around, he frowned like a berserker.

Here is what came of Jimmy Fayne's quick liking for Babe Littleford—

* * * * * * *

The days had passed swiftly, and autumn was far advanced. Save for a few chrysanthemums and asters that grew in places sheltered from the frosts, the flowers were all gone; the maples were shedding their leaves of brown, crimson and gold.

Ben Littleford's daughter had changed much in many ways. She had tried as hard as ever mortal tried to learn the correct use of words; and Mrs. Dale had been patient, painstaking and efficient in her teachings. Not that Elizabeth was educated, in any real sense of the word. Far from it. But her improvement was, in all truth, quite remarkable. She wore more or less costly gowns now, and a few jewels, thanks to Mrs. Dale, and wherever she went she attracted admiring glances.

Jimmy Fayne had been coming to see her when Mrs. Dale would permit it, which was not very often. Jimmy Fayne, as Patricia McLaurin had once been moved to say, was a far seeing young man for all his weaknesses; he had known in advance that the laurel bloom would change to a rose, and then to a white hyacinth. Perhaps he even considered the fact that she would make a better wife for him, and a better mother for his children, than some fragile and over-cultured woman of a patrician house that had about run out. At any rate, Jimmy Fayne, the ultra-spoiled, had decided that he would marry her.

During those weeks that had been made happy by an occasional hour at the home of the Dales, Fayne had not once mentioned marriage. He figured, and wisely enough, that to be too quick with his proposal would be to lose everything.

But now he meant to propose, for he knew that Miss Littleford intended going home for a visit—and he knew that when she went home she would see Carlyle Dale. The truth was, of course, that Miss Littleford was going to Tennessee to attend the October term of court at Cartersville.

It was a little after the middle of a bright afternoon. He found her sitting on an iron settee in a secluded corner of the lawn, where cape jessamines and lilac bushes grew in orderly array. She wore a light wrap, and there was an easy-to-read book in her hands; but she wasn't trying to read at the moment.

He bared his head, greeted her pleasantly, and asked permission to sit down beside her. She looked up at him. He was immaculately dressed.

"Of course," she granted with a smile that was very winsome.

He stated his mission briefly, for Mrs. Dale might appear at any minute.

"I came, Elizabeth, to ask you to marry me."

She sat as still as though she had not heard. He went on hastily:

"I confess that I'm a little ashamed of trying to take you away from Carlyle Dale, for he was always very nice to me. But I may be forgiven for that, I think, because I care for you a great deal. Anyway—'All is fair in love and war'—you know."

His voice was hardly businesslike, but it lacked original fire. Elizabeth Littleford closed the book in her lap, and lifted her clear brown eyes to his eager face.

"No," she disagreed, "all ain't—isn't fair in love and war. That's one o' the very silliest sayin's I've ever heard. As for the other—I like you, Jimmy, but not in the way you want me to. It's Bill Dale that I like—in that way, Jimmy."

Fayne looked disappointed. He was silent.

"You're a good boy, Jimmy," she went on, "and I hate to make you feel the least bit bad. It makes me—oh, Jimmy, it makes me blue. I wish you hadn't asked me. I'm sure you'll find some better girl than me—than I—for a wife."

"There is no better girl than you. Elizabeth. I'm going to wait—and hope."

He took up one of her hands and kissed it, rose and went toward the street. Before he had gone a minute, she rose, her face a little pale, and stared after him, sorely tempted—for Fayne's money could bring her people out of their long night of ignorance!

Well, if she didn't marry Bill Dale—and she feared that she wouldn't—she would marry Jimmy Fayne, if he still wanted her—if he would agree to help her people. After all, it wasn't so much to give. What was one poor little, unhappy human life?

It was late, that night, when Elizabeth Littleford went to sleep. And when at last she slept, she dreamed of walking through a fragrant green meadow with Bill Dale. There was the low humming of wild bees about the purple crowns of the ironweed and the scarlet bloom of the clover; there was the mating call of the partridge, and the loveiorn coo of a dove. . . .

Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. VOL. 2 — BELMOND, IOWA, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10 1921 — NO. 51

Town Requested To Observe Armistice Day

In Accordance With Governor's Request Legion and City Urge Observance

ALL BELLS TO BE TOLLED

Governor N. E. Kendall in a proclamation issued a few days ago, asks "that all public and church bells in Iowa be tolled at stated intervals between 11:45 o'clock a. m. and that from 12 o'clock to two minutes past that hour devout and patriotic citizens indulge in a period of solemn thanks to God for the valour and heroism of the American soldier, and of humble supplication for a continuance of the divine power for our beloved country."

The American Legion post of Belmond, thru Dr. George H. Steele, the post commander, and the city, thru Mayor M. C. Barry, request that the observance of the day be carried out here in this manner, and that the various churches, the schools and the city toll the bells as requested by the governor.

THEY MADE TWO CONTRACTS —DID EAGLE GROVE LEGION

Humboldt Republican: The Eagle Grove Legion that put on the forty and eight celebration there and employed the Thor base ball club to play the Eagles, admits that the matter was bungled badly by the committees in charge of amusements for the day One committee made an oral contract with the Thor boys to play on a basis of winner take sixty per cent of the gate receipts. Another committee mad a contract with an airplane committee to give an exhibition offering fifty per cent of the gate receipts. The airplane man put a checker at the gate and got his money. When Thor went after her share, she was put off with one excuse and another and kept out of settlement for more than a month. The plain fact was that the airplane man had the cash and Eagle Grove had no money with which to settle. Instead of facing the music she evaded and dodged. Of course the facts had to come out and the delay only brot out more bad blood. Thor is disgusted. More, she is sore at Eagle Grove.

The facts disclose the amount of the gate receipts as about $800. Thor received $60 for winning the game. She had been promised sixty per cent of the $800.

It is a mix-up mess, with the blame resting on the Eagle Grove legion.

The Thor boys have seen all the money they will ever see from that game.

NO HONOR AMONG THIEVES SAYS THIS MAN

Humboldt Republican: Two bootleggers in a neighboring town were skinned by a party on the sale of some hooch. He was supposed to run a distillery on the side. This party brought a bottle of "sample" whiskey to his friend and proposed the sale of a keg of the stuff. The deal was made. The barrel was delivered, tested and paid for. Later the purchasers attempted to draw more of the hooch and the barrel stubbornly refused to give up its contents. Investigation disclosed the fact that the supposed distillers had fastened a bottle of real hooch against the bung of the barrel and then filled the balance of the barrel with water. When the pint of real hooch was gone the barrel refused to give up any more, and the men are out their cash.

The Independent is in receipt of some literature from the Tyrrell-Combest Reality company of Beaumont Texas. The pamphlet was dealing with a lot sale at Beaumont, being promoted by the company mentioned. We presume that this is one more of the various lines of activity with which Mr. Tyrrell, an old-time Belmond resident, is connected. What we would like to know is how "Cap" ever keeps track of the many lines of endeavor in which he is interested.

IN MEMORIUM

In Flanders' fields the poppies grow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place,
While in the sky the larks,
Still bravely singing, fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

We are the dead.
Short days ago we lived,
Felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved,
And now we lie in Flanders' fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe!
To you, from falling hands we throw
The torch,
Be yours to hold it high!
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, tho poppies grow
In Flanders' fields.

Next week, November 14-18, is to be Better Speech Week in High School. A special program for the week is being prepared; posters are being made and many other preparations are under way. We hope our Better Speech Week will result in better spoken English all the rest of the year.

The next Literary program is a better speech program. At this program the purpose and aims of Better Speech Week will be explained. A mock trial will be given.

Last Friday afternoon Miss Shattuck, head of the public Speaking Department at Ames, was here. She kindly consented to read a few short selections to the high school. Nov. 30 she will be here to give a public recital. Plan to hear her.

Miss Mabel Cramer visited the high school Monday of this week.

REMEMBER, the Athletic teams want your new subscriptions and renewals to the Ladies Home Journal, Saturday Evening Post and Country Gentleman. Give them your order and they will do the rest.

The Goodell basketball team will play our boys on the local floor Tuesday night, Nov. 15. Be out to the first game with lots of pep for the team.

Last Thursday night our high school boys were matched against the Belmond High School Alumni, and altho they fumbled the ball many times they showed speed and head work that with practice should develope a first class team. Altho the high school boys won by a score of 13 to 8 the game was very close and interesting. The Alumni lacked team work, but their advantage in weight was apparent to the spectators thruout the entire game. Come out and see our boys matched against teams of their own weight. The dates are listed in our school calendar.

The high school girls played their first game against the town girls and met defeat. The town girls team was composed of all former high stars, while the high school team, with two exceptions, is new material. The first fifteen minutes the score stood even, but after that the superior strength of the older girls, with bad luck at basket shooting on the high school side, lost the game to the school. From the interest and pep exhibited among the girls, B. H. S. has a right to expect a good team for future games.

RED CROSS ANNUAL DRIVE STARTS FRIDAY

The fifth annual Red Cross roll call starts this week Friday, Armistice day, and extends to Thanksgiving, Nov. 25. The annual dues are one dollar, and half of this dollar is kept by the local chapter for use here,t he other half going to headquarters.

The local chapter is making no direct campaign this year, but is depending upon each person to pay their dues to the Red Cross. The dollar may be paid at either of the local banks. The Red Cross needs no explanation, its work and deeds are known by all. The privilege of belonging to an organization of this character for the dues of one dollar a year is a privilege which everyone should take advantage of. The Independent will give next week some facts of what the Red Cross has done the past year. Meanwhile, pay your dollar at the bank.

OPTION IS SECURED ON COUNTY FAIR GROUND

The Commercial club of Clarion held a meeting on Friday night of last week, at which the chief business was the report of a special committee that had been appointed to go into the fair ground matter. The committee reported that an option had been secured.

SAY, YOU—

Have you seen our "Independent pup"? Lost, strayed, or stolen, we haven't seen hide nor hair of him and we want him back. He is just a little white dog, with some brown and black spots around the head, and he wags his tail to the name of "Gyp." That dawg, folks, is just a dog, a full blooded dawg, with ancestry connected with pretty nigh every line of canine family trees in existance, but there isn't enough money in both Belmond banks to buy or keep him. He's full of fleas, he hasn't any more beauty than the law allows, but say—if you have him, or you know where he is, "tie him loose" and send him to us, will you? We can't do business without him. Any information will be gratefully received. by the editor. Thank you!

CONGREGATIONAL BAZAAR

The ladies of the Congregational church will hold the annual bazaar Thursday, Nov. 10, beginning at 9:00 a. m. The sale will include fancy work, aprons, cut flowers, plants and bulbs, country store, and rummage sale.

Fine roast chicken supper to be served, beginning at 5 p. m. All are cordially invited to attend. Price of supper, adults 35 cents, children under 12 years 25 cents

IF X EQUALS Y, WHAT IS Z?

You've read a lot of tales of the farmer who brought in a cow hide and didn't get enough to pay for having his shoes half soled, but we present for your consideration this week the case of Andrew Scot, residing on a farm west of town, who recently in the course of his labors butchered a calf. Being a farmer, he naturally was looking out to save every cent this year, so he skinned the animal while he was about it—a task which required some time, and when he had completed the job he drove to town and sold the hide.

And received 22c.

The same day that we were told this story by a friend of Mr. Scott's a man was in the office who had just purchased a pair of shoes. He paid five dollars and a half. Now if a calf hide is worth 22 cents, and a pair of shoes sells for $5.50, then the farmer either has to skin twenty-five calves of go barefooted.

"Ain't we got fun" raising calves at the rate of 25 per pair of shoes and donating the labor? It's a great life if you don't weaken, but at this rate something has got to crack before long.

See L. Tokman before you sell your hides and furs.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to express thanks to our friends for flowers and the many acts of kindness shown us during our recent bereavement. Also to the choir and pastor of the Congregational church for their services.

Mrs. L. W. Wendell and children.

HALLOWE'EN PARTY

The members of the Idle-a While club entertained their husbands and a few friends at a Hallowe'en party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Brady.

The home was beautifully decorated and the Hallowe'en designs were artistic and very effective.

Thirty guests were met at the door by "spooks" and "ghosts," each wrapped in a long sheet and taken thru a long dark hall where they were made to climb steps and then slide down a slide to the floor. From there they were taken back into the living room where the rest of the evening was spent in games and all kinds of Hallowe'en stunts, among which were the witches fortune telling den, and the terrible electric chair.

At a late hour the guests were invited to the dining room where a bountious two-course luncheon was served by the club members.

THE BOOZE LIAR

The booze liar still lives. He is a persistent propagandist and he has little sense. You can still hear him on the streets, in the pool halls, almost anywhere and anytime that men assemble. His mouth is always open to declare that there is as much booze drank as ever, that you can buy it anywhere and that drunkness is on the increase, says the Fairmnt Sentinel.

The fact is that there is at least a thousand times as much booze talk as there is booke—and that isn't denying that some moonshine and other contraband liquor still cirulates among anarchistic people who won't abide by or respect the law that conflicts with their own stubborn ideas and appetites.

Charley Dillman, of the Blue Earth Post, a reliable editor of the old school, sophisticated and observant, whose observations on all matters other than political can be safely rated at par, makes the following significant observation in this week's paper:

It has been our privilege to attend two big gatherings of late, one at Estherville, the other at Sherburn. It is conservatively estumated that at these two gatherings there were 25,000 people. In all this vast concourse not a single person was to be seen under the influence of liquor. And say, good people, what a happy change has come to us in the recent years. Ten years ogo 10 per cent of the number would have been under the influence of liquor, lives would have been endangered not only in the towns named above, but along the public highways leading to and from these places. We still have more or less reckles auto drivers, but thinks be, they are sober as a general thing. No, the man who used to "take one" occasionally and semi-occasionally, is today the man who will stand with body erect, look you straight in the eye and tell you he would not go back to old conditions for the world."—Northwood Anchor.

Some men seem destined to go down life's pathway parked on the wrong side where they get the bumps of everybody else.

"One man's meat is another man's poison," and in these days of home-grown hooch about everybody's drink is everybody's poison.

WORTH THIRTY CENTS

(Editor's note—The following, taken from an exchange, rings the bell for real truth, and expresses the sentinments of the Independent better than any editorial we could write. We pass it on to our farmer readers with but one comment, "Them's our Sentiments!")

Did you ever get up early
When the day was newly born?
Get your good team and your wagon
And go and husk a load of corn?
Did you ever stop and ponder
With your back against the fence,
That the corn you'd been a husking
Might be worth just thirty cents?

Did you ever stop to wonder
When the kiddies needed clothes
And your wife said flour and sugar
And some powder for her nose?
Did you ever stop and wonder
When she said your head was dense
How you ever got that sugar
With the corn at thirty cents?

Did you ever want a Buick
Reo, Overland, or Grant
Did you ever want a Chandler,
With its gentle purr and pant?
Did you ever want a Hudson
With its overhead expense?
Did you ever want a Jitney
With your corn at thirty cents?

Did you ever read the bible
When the tots were reading theirs?
Did you ever sit and whistle
When your wife was at her prayers?
Did you ever help the heathen
With little recompense
Can you be a right good christian
With your corn at thirty cents?

Did you ever ask your father
When your banker wasn't home?
Did you ever go and ask him
For a nifty little loan?
(And you'd pay him back in August Interest-principal-expense)
You'll play thunder a-payin' father
With your corn at thirty cents.

You may rave and rant and rattle
Till your head and throat are sore;
You may curse and "cuss" and battle,
But you won't get any more.
You may go and tell your Uncle Sam
You bear your own expense;
You may die and see who gives a darn
When your corn's at thirty cents.

TOLD IN RHYME

"NOVEMBER 11, 1921"

A brief three years since that auspicious day
When from the clouds of war a shining ray
Of hope descended to the sons of men
And grew in radiance until again
The morning sun of Peace smiled calmly down
From skies which four long years had worn a frown.
Now on this anniversary they come,
The Nations of the Earth, nor fife nor drum
Nor gaudy trappings of that monster dread
That smiling ghoul who fattens on the dead,
But solemnly and with high seriousness
May they have come together to impress
Upon the world the Greater Armistice,
A truce to wars, a death to avarice!
God give them minds above the petty hates
And broils and bickerings of jealous states!
O'er all the world wnere War's dread children thrive,
Famine and suff'ring, crime and death all strive
To teach the lesson mankind long has sought
(Yet strive in vain, for man will not be taught)
Eyes with despair long dimmed at last are bright
With hope, and hearts bowed down and crushed by Might
Are beating faster on this day of days.
Oh, fail us not, ye in whose care the ways
And destines of nations are assigned,
Whose hands now hold the fate of humankind!
Else your inheitance shall be the scorn
And contumely of those yet unborn.
Oh, fail us not, we cry from East and West,
And millions shall rise up to call you blest.

CLIPPINGS

A big football game between Clarion and Eagle Grove will be the main attraction at Clarion on Armistice day Nov. 11. A second team game is also being arranged for. Coffee and dough nuts will be served free from a tent in the court house yard. The Legion men of the county are especially invited. All are welcome.—Monitor.

Many autoes went in the ditches along the pavement Sunday. The shoulder at the sides was soft and if one wheel went off into the dirt it was almost impossible to get back onto the pavement again without help. The dirt had been graded recently and the heavy rains of the latter part of the week caused this condition. The road from here to Mason City was lined with cars all day Sunday. Cars that came in from dirt roads were using chains and in many places they could scarcely get thru at all.—Garner Signal.

L. T. Buschmann of Belmond had business at the court house yesterday and was a special caller at the home of his old friend Treasurer John Surballe.—Garner Signal.

A 22 calibre rifle was accidently discharged Tuesday evening, the bullet lodging in Frank Tanner's thigh. With W. C. Jaehnel, Mr. Tanner stopped in to see Mr. Cosner. Mr. Cosner was cleaning his rifle and when the mechanism refused to work, Mr. Jaehney attempted to fix it for him. The rifle discharged and the bullet struck Mr. Tanner who was sitting in a nearby chair.—Eagle.

R. D. Box of the Belmond neighborhood was a county seat business caller Thursday. Speaking of hard times, he said the trouble with most of the younger farmers these days is that they begin business with an automobile and a tractor. Thirty years ago an old lumber wagon and a few horses were all that was required.—Monitor.

IOWA'S GOLDEN CARGO NOW OVER SEAS

Iowa's "golden cargo" of gift corn shipped by the farmers of the state for the relief of the starving Armenians in the near east, has arrived. Word of the delivery of the more than 4,400 tons of corn products at the port of Batoun was received today by Iowa headquarters of the near east relief.

Practically entire cargo of corn products, shipped last summer on the "Datchet," was contributed by the farmers of the state from their own fields. The corn was milled chiefly at Cedar Rapids, Le Mars and Omaha and shipped in finished form.

"The corn grits and flour have been issued to all districts" says the official report received today at the Iowa headquarters. "This is the first known introduction of corn products into the Caucasus and they bid fair to outrival wheat in many respects in popularity for food."

The releif workers are making a bread out of a mixture of 35 per cent corn products with wheat. The hominy grits sent from Iowa are being used chiefly in the form of porridge or mixed with soup or meat and served from the food kitchens in the famine areas.

The report continues:

"The medical staff declares that the corn is a Godsend because of its strength in vitamines. In fact, served in any form, the corn meal, corn flour and hominy are eaten with great avidity throughout the stricken areas."

The new corn campaign which has been launched in Iowa this fall by the Near East Relief will seek further donations of grain from the farmers to be used in these same forms in the famine regions. The first shippment from Iowa last summer contained 42 carloads of corn products.

HE DENIES HE IS DEAD— BUT RED TAPE SAYS HE IS

Immediately after the war it was uncommon to hear that a man declared dead by the government was not dead. Such mistakes were bound to occur we suppose but three years after a war would suppose that the government would have checked all such cases up. At Atlantic, Ia., there is a lady whom the government insists is a widow, in spite of all her repeated protests that she is not. Her husband returned from the war without a scratch and he also insists that he is very much alive. Their congressman has also tried to convince the war department that they are mistaken, but still the department insists that the man was killed in France.—Palo Alto Reporter.

Hundreds of batteries die of thirst every year.

A Prouounced Success

The unform success that has attended the use of Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy in the relief and cure of bowel complaints, both children and adults, has brought it to almost universal use, so that it is practically without a rival and as everyone who has used it knows, it is without an equal.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

IOWA FALLS MAN TELLS COURT NEWS IN HIS AD

There is a merchant at Iowa Falls whose display advertising in the newspapers at that place are full of more personalities and ginger than is ordinarily found. This merchant, Berfield by name, recently wrote up his experiences at district court in Clarion in the following way, which was the leading article of his advertisement:

"I was called to Clarion last week as a witness on a case being tried in that fair city, I spent three days and one night in Clarion at an expense of $9.70 to the county and every blessed thing I did for the money was to occupy the stand for possibly two minutes on one occasion.

"Court is a necessary function of government and as a function of government I suppose we should not expect it to operate efficiently or economically.

"While in Clarion I heard a story purporting to be true, of a certain man who made an error of one cent in remitting his income tax. The department sent him several letters about it but being a careless cuss he neglected to send in the cent until finally a collecter made a special trip to get it. Well, he got the cent all right and his expenses, including salary, while so engaged, was $60.00. Efficiency and economy?"

IOWA TO HAVE MILITARY TACTICS IN PRIMARIES

Iowa is to have a taste of military tactics in the primaries next spring.

A thoro-going organization is being recruited thruout Iowa this month by Col. Leon W. Ainsworth who will make the race for Republican nomination for State Treasurer at the coming primaries. He has announced that he will have everything from colonels to corporals in the organization which will direct his campaign for the nomination.

The state has been divided into sectors, a plan of campaign laid out for each and a commander placed in charge. Each county and city will have its corporal or captain, whichever it may be.

Most of Ainsworth's organization will be composed of world war veterans and farmers. He is a large farm owner and a veteran of the world war and Spanish-American war and is relying on these forces for his chief support.

A new factor likely to figure in the race for the treasurership is the probable candidacy of E. H. Hoyt, former state treasurer. Hoyt has not announced himself but has been pushed forward in political circles during the last few weeks. C. H. Le Valley of Sheffield is also working in the direction of a nomination for the same office.

Politicians declare that the fight for the treasurership will be one of the hottest witnessed in Iowa in a long time.

AUTO TAGS FOR 1922 ARE NOW HERE

The 1922 automobile license plates for Wright county motorists are now at the county seat. The new plates are smoewhat similar to the ones that are now in use, the numbers this year being black on a silver background. The difference in the new and old is noticeable enough to make it easy to tell the difference.

The serial number for Wright is the last on the list, number 99, and the numbers of the license plates will start with 99-1 and run up to 99-4500. Truck numbers will begin at 41901 and go to 42300.

If you want a 1922 license you can pay for it now, but you cannot get the plate until the first of December. Blanks for the work are also on hand at the treasurer's office, so that the man who desires a low number will have his wish gratified if he pays the tax ahead of time.

ROADMAKING PLAN FALLS SHORT

Farmers living on the Woolstock-Clarion road which has just recently been graded and tiled out, and which will not be graveled for at least another year, broached the matter of having the county arrange to go ahead with graveling the road this winter letting the farmers along the road do the work, taking their pay in county warrants and liquidating some of their indebtedness to the merchants of the two towns with the same warrants, says the News.

But this plan struck a snag. On work of this nature a contract must belet according to bids, and as it would be impossible to contract with fifty farmers as individuals, the plan did not get farther than a speculative stage. At that, tho, it wouldn't be a bad way of giving employment to such farmers as wished.

HOME BUTCHERING AND CURING OF MEATS PROFITABLE NOW

Under the present conditions the home butchering and curing of meats should be very profitable. The high freights combined with the numerous handling charges make the packing house products unreasonabaly high when compared with the price the farmer receives for the animal on foot.

The labor on the average farm during winter months is not so urgent but that ample time for home butchering could be found.

Animals selected for food should be healthy. They should also be in good condition. Lean, scawny animals do not give much satisfaction when served on the table. Fat improves the flavor, tenderness, and appearance ot the carcass.

Meat from old animals is usually tough; while that from animals which are too young lacks flavor and substance due to thehigh water content. An old animal will make a fairly edible carcass if fattened rapidly.

Animals should not be fed for a period of 24 to 30 hours before killing. This clears the system and aids in bleeding. Food in the digestive tract decomposes rapidly after slaughtering and is liable to taint the meat. The animal should be given all the water it will drink as this clears the system of food and makes it easier to drain off the blood.

Anamals intended for immediate slaughgter should not be bruised or whipped. This tends to excite them, increasing the body temperature and thereby making it impossible to properly bleed the animal. Bruises also cause a blood clot at the point of injury which disfugures the carcass.

DO YOU KEEP A BUDGET?

Iowa families all need budgets, if the family finances are going to be handled properly, says Miss Eda Lord Murphy, of the home economics department of Iowa State College. Not only does the budget help the women but it is a great assistance to the husband who can plan on some of the larger items which require goodly portions of his income.

Due to the increased number of applications for information on how to make budgets and where to get information on them, Miss Murphy has prepared a list of some valuable books on the subject and she will furnish this list with names of publishers and prices to anyone interested.

A recent inquiry on the budget problem came from an Iowa farmer who started keeping books on running of the farm and decided that as long as he was studying the farm accounting he might as well plan a budget for the household.

"If your husband gives you an allowance, you should keep a budget," says Miss Murphy.

"Whether he expects you to ask for money or treats you as a partner in the game of homemaking, the budget will solve many problems."

ARMISTICE DAY CELEBRATION AT CLARION

A most cordial invitation is extended to all Legion men of Wright county to attend the Armistice day celebration at Clarion Friday, Nov. 11. The program will begin by an excellent concert by the Clarion Municipal band at 2:15 on the court house square. At 3 o'clock will be staged one of the best football games of the season—Eagle Grove vs. Clarion. At 6 o'clock a free supper will be served to all Legion men; others 50c. In the evening a dance will be given at Cornelia pavilion, which is also free to Legion men; others $1.00 ana tax. The Clarion American Legion is planning on entertaining a large crowd on Armistice day.

SENATOR SCHAFFTER DIES

Eagle: Senator Eugene Schaffter died at his home in this city Monday at one o'clock a. m. For several weeks he was known to be a very sick mand and that his strength would not be able to withstand the progress of disease, which was diagnosed as pernicious anemia. For the past two years the senator knew he was afflicted with this dread disease but it did not develope seriously until last spring. He made several trips to Rochester, Minn., where the Mayos were consulted. Several blood transfusions were attempted but none with lasting results. The last one was attempted Sunday evening in a vain effort to prolong his life. He was conscious but a half hour afterwards and passed away without suffering about one o'clock Monday morning. Owing to the prominence of Senator Schaffter in lodge circles and his wide acquaintance in the state, the funeral services were held in the Methodist church in order to provide for those who wished to attend.

LAKE MILLS MAN MYSTERIOUSLY DISAPPEARS

Forest City Summit: Word was sent out from Lake Mills last Friday that Samuel Elam, farmer near there, disappeared from his home almost two weeks ago and has not been seen nor heard from since by members of his family. It is believed that discouragement because of reverses is the cause of his taking leave. Elam leaves a wife and several children, ranging in age from 1 to 17. Mrs. Elam stated that her husband had just returned from Chicago where he sold a herd of cattle, and that there had been no domestic troubles between them. The fact that he was unable to meet heavy loans and lease terms with the returns from his crops and cattle is believed to be responsible for the disappearance.

MANY STORES GOING ON CASH BASIS PLAN

Hampton Chronicle: Many stores thruout Iowa have gone n the cash basis during the past few months and in every instance so far reported the new system of doing business is pleasing to both patron and store owner. The credit system has been a curse to many families and the ruination of many a business institution.

When people go away from home to buy goods they pay cash, but the home merchant who has always trusted ed them is never appreciated. Why is he not entitled to as good treatment as is accorded to the merchant in a distant town? Cash buying helps keep the family expnses down, because one realizes more every day where the "cuts" in expenses are necessary. The merchant can also sell cheaper and always has the money on hand to pay his bills and is also able to pick up cash snaps which he can pass on to his customers at a big saving.

AN EASY TASK

It takes money to run a newspaper. What an exaggeration. What a whopper. It doesn't take money to run a newspaper. It is not a venture. It is a charitable instution, a begging concern, a highway robber. The newspaper is a child of the air, a creature of a dream. It can go on when any concern would be in the hands of the receiver and wound up with cobwebs in the windows.

It takes wind to run a newspaper; it takes gall to run a newspaper. It takes scintillating acrobatic imagination, half a dozen white shirts and a railroad pass to run a newspaper. But money! Heavens to Betsy and six hands round. Who ever needed money to conduct a newspaper. Kind words are mediums of exchange that do the business for the editor—kind words and church social tickets. When you see an editor with money, watch him. He'll be paying his bills and disgracing his profession. Never give money to an editor; make him trade it out. He likes a swap.

Then when you die, after you have stood around for years and sneered at the editor and his little Jim Crow paper be sure that you have your wife send in for three extra copies by one of your weeping children and when she reads the generous and touching notice about you, forewarn her to neglect to send the editor nine cents. It would overwhelm him. Money is a corrupting thing. The editor knows it, and what he wants is your heartfelt thanks; then he can thank his printers and they can thank the grocers. Give your job work to a travling man and then ask for half rates for church notices. Get your lodge letter heads and stationery out of town and then flood the editor with beautiful thoughts in cards of thanks and resolution of respect. They make such spicy reading and you are so proud of your local paper when you pick it up filled with these glowing mortuary articles.

But money—scorn the filthy thing! Don't let the pure, innocent editor know anything about it. Keep that for sordid tradespeople who charge for their wares. The Lord loves a cheerful giver. He takes care of the editor, who has a charter from the state to act as a door mat for the community. He will get out the paper somehow, and stand for the town and whoop it up for you when you run for office. Don't worry about the editor—he'll get on. The Lord knows how—but somehow.—Hastings-on-the Hudson news.

Say what you will about druggists offering something "just as good" because it pays a better profit, the fact still stands that ninety-nine out of a hundred druggists recommend Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy, when the best medicine for diarrhoea is asked for, and do so because they know from what their customers say of it, that it can be depended upon.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

My country 'tis of thee,

Of thee I sing;
Land where we have all tried
To break the law and lied
From every mountian side,
The Bootleg springs.

And thy illicit stills,
The moonshine runs in rills

LOSES CATTLE FROM CORN STALK POISONING

Andrew Scott, residing on a farm west of town, had the misfortune to lose three head of cattle, two calves and a cow, from poisoning caused by eating corn stalks in the field. And it wouldn't pay to skin the critters and sell the hides for 22 cents either.

Malisa White, who is out on parole from a ten year sentence in connection with the Goldfield and Woolstock robberies of a year ago, says she has married Herbert Bige. They are residing on a farm near Robertson. Bige is to be tried for his part in the above robberies. The fact that the couple are now man and wife will prevent damaging testimony being given against Bige by this witness. That is a new way of defeating the ends of justice. The outcome will be awaited with interest. The above facts came to light several days ago when the White woman made her monthly report to Sheriff Lang as required by law.

FARM BUREAU NEWS ITEMS

NOT ABLE TO SUPPLY DEMAND FOR CORN PICKERS

We have not been able to supply the demand for corn pickers coming to this office. Why? Because an effort has been made to keep the price uniform, three cents for elevators and 3 1-2 cents without. Farmers thruout the county are breaking over this price and instead of men looking for work, coming to the office in the usual way, they go out looking for the high bidders. No one blames the pickers for taking the places where the highest wage is offered. Take a survey of your own district and see who is to blame for the scarcity of huskers at the uniform price.

Men are plentiful and will take up the jobs husking corn for the price that is generally being paid as soon as the four and five cent corn is out. Some renters selling their corn for twenty cents are giving the owners one-half and the corn picker one-fourth, leaving them five cents per bushel. When will farmers learn to stick, setting their own price, instead of letting the other fellow always tell what it is worth?

Many farmers have a large acreage of corn to harvest and of course are anxious to get it in, but are determined not to overbid their neighbors in order to secure help. Wait until we have had a little cold weather and some of the told-of millions out of employment quit riding and sleeping in box cars, then help will be much more plentiful. Let the office know if you wish pickers at three and one-half cents per bushel.

GRAIN BEETLES AND WEEVILS

We are receiving a number of reports about the weevils and beetles that are working in the stored grain. There are a number of types of these but only three that are generally found in the state. The ordinary weevil is a small, chestnut brown, about one-sixth of an inch in length. There are four or five generations of this a year. The weevil is the most common and works on practically every kind of grain. There is also the sawtooth grain beetle which works on all kinds of grain and also eats flour, cardboard boxes, etc. It is about one-tenth of an inch in length and secretes a sticky substance which holds the kernels of grain together. It has four or five generations a year. The third weevil is much larger and only has one generation a year.

The method if killing these is by the use of carbon disulphide, one lb. per hundred bushels of grain or stronger. The bin should be made as nearly tight as possible and then the carbon disulphide placed in shallow earthen vsesels on the top of the grain and the grainary door closed. This material will evaporate and as it is heavier than air will settle down thru the grain. Carbon disulphide is inflamable and very poisonous and care should be used in handling it. After a day or two the bin may be opened and aired out.

The farm bureau has made arrangements for securing carbon disulphide thru the Fruit Growers association at a considerable saving to members who make application.

FARMERS FOR WORLD-WIDE PEACE

Thousands of farmers a day are enrolling in the army of disarmament and permanent peace. The state farm bureau federations which have had time to reply to the American Farm Bureau federation's call for two million signers to the peace petition pledge themselves to do all within their power to voice effectively the wishes of rural America to the disarmament conference.

A digest of national expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the latest available, reveals the following startling situation:

Expenditures arising from recent and previous wars $3,855,482.60. War and Navy departments $1,424,138,676,-57, Primary and Government functions executive, legislative, judicial, etc., $181,087,222.41. Public works $186,203,557.46, researches, educational and develópement $57,093,660.93.

Out of the total $5,686,005,705.97, 67.81 per cent was for recent and previous wars; 25.2 per cent was for the War and Navy departments, which in fact means preparation for future wars; 3.19 per cent was for the cost of operating the government; 2.97 per cent was for the public works, and 1.01 per cent was for research.

To the Iowa Farm Bureau federation goes the credit for starting the disarmament petition. In the October issue of the "Iowa Farm Bureau Messenger" the petition was printed. The replies are coming in to the Des Moines office of the state farm bureau in mail sacksful.

The last meeting of the executive committee of the Iowa Farm Bureau federation took a very decided stand on the matter in favor of disarmament and expressed the thought that all the state farm bureaus should join in a petition with as many signers as possible favoring disarmament.

The petiton is now before all the state farm bureau federations. It is believed that 2,000,000 people will sign it.

FARMERS SECURE GRAIN RATE CUT

The farm bureau has taken the first trench. On Oct. 20 the Interstate Commerce commission rendered a decision in the grain case, which was submitted on Sept. 3, 1921. The commission said:

"We find that the present rates on wheat and hay involved here in will be for the future unjust and unreasonable to the extent that they may individually include more than one-half of the increase authorized in Ex-Parte No. 74. We further find that the present rate on coarse grains will be for the future unjust and unreasonable to the extent that they may exceed rates 10 per cent less than those herein prescribed as just and reasonable on wheat from and to the same points An order will be entered in accordance with our findings if that becomes necessary. We shall expect the reductions to be made as soon as practicable, and not later than November 20, 1921.

This means a substantial reduction in the freight rates on grain and hay. The commission authorizes a reduction of one-third of the advance of last year, or 17 1-2 per cent on wheat, and hay based upon the rates of Aug. 24, 1920, and 17 1-2 per cent on coarse grains. Translating these percentages into figures applicable to present rates, it means a reduction of 13 per cent on present wheat rates and 23 per cent on present corn rates. It is estimated by the transportation department of the American Farm Bureau federation that this is a net saving to the farmers of America of $40,000,000 annually.

In the grain case the American Farm Bureau federation appeared as on intervenor. The farm bureau submitted more evidence than any other organization, directed the cross questioning and participated in the oral argument.

ATLANTA MEET WILL DETERMINE POLICY

What the American Farm Bureau federation will accomplish in 1922 will be determined at Atlanta, Ga., Nov. 21-23 at the third annual meeting of the organidation.

Within the past twelve months this national organization of farmers has grown into one of the most powerful forces in the U. S. It has completed its organization work in 47 states; organized state federation headquarters in Chicago and built up a legislative office in Washington, D. C. The farm bureau at its annual meeting this year will review the past year's work, but of far more importance will be the outline of the program of work that the federation will undertake during the next twelve months.

The Farm Bureau prides itself on representing the individual farmer. Its actions, according to the officials of the federation, are determined entirely by the wishes of its 1,300,000 members. The policies of the organization are determined by delegates from each of the state federations. The number of delegates from each state is determind by the paid up membership of the state federation. One voting delegate is allowed for the state at large and one for every 20,000 paid up members. These delegates constitute the board of directors. In addition to the board of directors there is a house of delegates made up of the floor, but no vote. A state is allowed one representative in the house of delegates for every 10,000 farmers in the state.

The activity of the American Farm Bureau federation in promoting the organization of nation-wide co-operative marketing organizations and the powerful stand it has taken on national legislative problems have aroused such a nation wide interest in the organization that not only the eyes of the entire agricultural section but also those of the commercial and political world will be centered on the annual meeting.

In the review of the federation's work in 1920 particular interest will be attached to the report of Gray Silver, who is in charge of the Washington office. The present congress has to its credit more agricultural legislation than any other since the first congress convened in the old state house in Philadelphia. This agricultural legislation has been passed largely at the instigation of the farm bureau.

J. W. Coverdale, secretary of the federation, who has charge of the department of organization will include in his report not only an account of the organization of federations in 47 states, but also the reports of the eight departments housed in the Chicago office of the organization.

VITALIZED CO-OPERATIVE MARKETING

The report of the department of co-operative marketing will tell how the commodity idea has been developed by the farm bureau, will tell of the six commodity meetings held during the year and of the appointment of export committees to work out the problem of marketing of each of these commodities. It will tell in detail the work of the farmers' grain marketing committee of 17 and its plan which grew into the U. S. Grain Growers Inc. It will also tell of the establishment, within the federation of divisions of wool marketing, dairy marketing, and grain marketing. It will tell of the plans for the immediate creation of divisions of fruit marketing, livestock marketing and cotton marketing.

Outstanding in the report of the department of transportation will be the story of its intervention in the grain rate case, which resulted in the recent cut of $40,000,000 in grain rates, a reduction of $10,000,00 in livestock rates, and of its activity in securing a rate reduction on all basic commodities.

SOUTH DAKOTA FARMERS TO USE THEIR CORN FOR FUEL

A dispatch from Huron, South Dakota, states that despite the hysteria that prevails in some parts of the state anent the buring of corn by farmers while thousands of people are starving in Europe and Asia, reports show that farmers in many quarters are determined to handle their own affairs and do their own thinking on this subject.

Recently a farmer living near the town of Wessington who was hard up for ready cash and the second installment of his taxes becoming delinquent November 1, decided to sell off some corn, even tho the price was then down to 14 cents. He had paid five cents a bushel for picking, and then had to pay four cents to have it shelled. He hauled two double boxes of corn to Wessington and the best price he could get for it was nine cents per bushel, barely the cost of picking and shelling.

It is reported that he sold the corn corn is not even good for fuel. He rather than haul it home,and shelled made the statement to business men at Wessington that he intended to burn the remainder of his 1921 crop on the cob instead of buying fuel.

According to the Brookings County Press, regardless of scientific analysis, the comparative heat unit value, the hysterical objections of sentimentalists who think it is wicked to burn corn while millions are starving in other lands for lack of food, a great many farmers in Brookings county are now burning corn for fuel instead of coal. And these farmers do not think they are wicked. They believe the charge of wickedness should be placed against those responsible for the prices of corn and coal. Moralizing, sentimental arguments or comparative scientific "dope" on the heat values of the two articles, based on present prices, will not outweigh the practical tests that the farmers are making in their own homes.

Farmers say they are not going to haul corn to town and sell it at 17 to 24 cents a bushel and use the money to buy coal at from $11 to $18 per ton. Not, at least, while they have the corn right on their own farm, and while it makes good fuel.

Roughly estimated, there are about 3,500,000 bushels of 1921 corn in the county, over and above that used for silage. It will thus be seen that the farmers of Brookings county, while hard pressed for ready cash, and up against big odds, especially on a coal basis, are pretty well supplied with both fuel and feed, and in the final showdown can eat "Johnny" cake and burn it too, from the same crop.

Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

AN ARDENT PRAYER

The following prayer, thaken from an old issue of a Gloucester, Massachusetts paper, was given us for publicity by an old subscriber. Read it.

At the Glouscester, Mass. Municipal Council on January 17, the following prayer was offered by the Rev. Levi M. Powers of the Gloucester Independent Christian church:

Almighty Father, the love of our city calls us here this morning. We begin today a new year of civic life. We know that it is useless to ask thy blessing unless we want it and are anxious for it. No matter how much you may want to bless this city, you cannot do it unless the citizens are willing to be blessed.

We pray therefore first of all for the voters of this city. There are some too lazy to vote but not too lazy to grumble. Bless them.

We pray for the taxpayers who want good streets, good schools, good fire and police protection and good health officers, but who wish other people to pay for their cost.

We pray for the business men whose votes are always determined by the expectation of special favors for themselves. Bless them if you can.

We pray for those who believe that all laws should be enforced which they do not like or which if enforced would trouble them.

We pray for the comfortable who do not care about anything so long as they are left at ease.

We pray for the political managers who swap votes and sell out their friends and let the bad candidate go unopposed.

We pray for those who vote for the saloons simply because they have the property that rents for more for that than for any other purpose.

We pray for the men who are so mean they are not willing to give their neighbors the same privilege they have themselves.

We pray for all connected with the newspapers who openly advocate civic righteousness and secretly promote crooked politics.

We pray for the lawyers to whom law means only a knowledge of helping those who wish to evade the law to do so safely and so enable themselves to get something for nothing. —Reporter.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

Green Tomato Mince Meat

The housewife often considers things made with green tomatoes as not quite so good as some other combinations. However, this unusually tasty recipe proves that this is not true. It is made with green tomatoes, brown sugar and raisins.

Use 1 peck green tomatoes, 2 1-2 lbs. brown sugar, 2 lbs. raisins, 1 lb. beef suet, 1-2 cup vinegar, 2 T salt, 2 T ground cinnamon, 1 T ground cloves, 2 T nutmeg, and 2 cups of chopped apples if desired.

Slice the tomatoes thinly, or put them through a food chopper. Allow them to drain, cover with cold water, place over fire and allow to boil for five minutes. Drain well, add suet, vinegar, fruit and seasoning. Return to the fire and allow to simmer from 30 to 45 minutes. Pack hot.

How Can I Tell if This Fruit juice Will Jell."

This is a common question among housewives when the jelly season brings with it worries of whether the jelly glasses will be filed with firm jelly with the "runny" variety. A specialist recommends this test as sure. Add 1-2 T Epson salts and 1-2 T sugar to 1 T of hot fruit juice. If the juice contains pecin (the technical name for jelling property) the solution will become jelly-like.

To Cut Cut Down A Beaver Hat

Beaver hats are being shown among the best millinery styles for this winter. Many folks have old beaver hats left over from another season and can be cut into more fashionable shapes by this simple method.

Do not use scissors or knife. Take any size beaver hat. Remove bobbin and thread from the sewing machine and make the smallest possible stitch. Mark the size desired on the brim of the hat with tailor's chalk or if the edge is to be the same all around place the guage on the machine. feeder and run just as if making a seam. Sew it twice in the same place and break the hat apart at the place where its been stitched. The needle cuts through the heavy part of the brim but does not break and hair and the edge comes out as soft and fuzzy as when the hat orignally came from the factory. The part of the brim which is removed may be utilized as trimming by cutting it into different shapes using the same method as was used for the hat.

Protect Leather Furniture Coverings.

Leather furniture coverings last longer and look better if occasionally rubbed with castor oil which gradually dries out. The liquid should be rubbed in well and the excess taken off with a soft cloth. Otherwise the film of oil will collect dirt, will darken the

HOW EDITORS GET RICH

A great many persons have wondered how editors got rich so quickly and with such small effort. One of them who has grown rich at last told the secret of it. His outline is as follows:

"A nursery firm will send us a 25-cent rosebush for only $5 worth of advertising.

"For a six-inch advertisement for one year, we can get a gross of pills.

"About one dozen firms are wanting to give us shares in gold mines for advertising.

"For $40 worth of advertising and $25 in cash we can own a bicycle. The wheel sells for just $12.

"A fellow out West wants us to run a lot of advertising for him for nothing and if it brings results he may become a customer.

"For running $12 worth of locals we can get two tickets admitting us to the circus in the city and pay our own fare on the railroad.

"A gun firm wants us to run $19 worth of advertising and then send $10 in exchange for a shotgun. Such a gun would retail at about $6.

"By running $50 worth of advertising and sending $25 to Atlantic City firm we will be given a deed to a lot. When the tide is in the lot stands six feet under water.

"When a man dies the undertaker gets from $75 to $150 to bury him and the editor gets nothing for publishing his obituary notice."

Have you paid your subscription to the Independent yet? We need the two dollars right now, and will appreciate it if those who know themselves to be in arrears will come in and leave us two dollars. Every little helps these days. Thanks!

The CLAN CALL

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

CHAPTER VI.—To get proper surgical aid, John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Dale convey "Babe," unconscious, to the city. Doctors assure them she is not seriously hurt. Dale meets an old friend, Bobby McLaurin, who had married Patricia Clavering. Telling his father of David Moreland's coal, the old gentleman's actions convince his son of his father's guilt in the killing of Moreland.

CHAPTER VII.—It is arranged that "Babe" is to stay with Mrs. McLaurin to be educated. Dale, refusing his father's proffered financial aid to develop the mine, interests Newton Wheatley, capitalist, who agrees to furnish the money. Dale realizes he loves "Babe."

CHAPTER VIII. — Returning to the Halfway Switch, Dale meets Major Bradley, lawyer, and real friend of the mountaineers, whom he engages as counsel for the company. A man named Goff, of evil repute, tries to bribe Dale to betray the Morelands by selling him the coal deposits, and telling them they are of little value. Dale attempts to thrash him, but Goff draws a revolver. Dale is unarmed.

CHAPTER IX.—Goff enlists the aid of a turbulent crowd, the Balls and Torreys, to make trouble for Dale's company. The Littlefords and Morelands agree to forget the old feud and dwell in harmony.

CHAPTER X.—"Babe" returns to her home, fearing she is a burden to the McLaurins. Dale remonstrates, and she agrees to go back, for the sake of an education. Waylaid by "Black Adam" Ball, Dale fights a pistol duel with the desperado, and Ball is killed. Dale is arrested and taken to jail at Cartersville. He doesn't see how his shot could have killed Ball.

CHAPTER XI.—There is much speculation as to who really killed Ball, the general opinion being it was By Heck, who had constituted himself Dale's guardian.

CHAPTER XII. — Caleb Moreland, son of John Moreland, admits firing the shot which killed Ball, and takes Dale's place in jail. He is innocent, but takes the blame for the killing in order that Dale can continue the development of the mine.

CHAPTER XIII.—On the pretext of investigating another coal deposit, Dale is decoyed to a gathering of the Balls and Torreys. They "try" him for the murder of Adam Ball, find him guilty, and sentence him to be hanged next day. He is rescued by By Heck. Goff is forced to leave the neighborhood.

CHAPTER XIV. — "Babe" writes Dale that she is living with his parents and that her education is progressing. Jimmy Fayne, rich and dissolute, asks "Babe" to marry him, but she tells him she loves Dale.

CHAPTER XV.—"Babe" comes to Cartersville to attend Dale's trial. He is acquitted of the murder of Ball. Dale asks "Babe" to marry him. She loves him, but tells him she cannot be his wife.

CHAPTER XV.

Tried.

Two days before Bill Dale was tried in court at Cartersville, the new Elizabeth Littleford alighted from an afternoon train at the Halfway switch. She was dressed in a smart and neatly-fitting suit of dark blue, with lacey white at her throat and at her wrists; she wore a hat of dark blue relieved by a touch of white. In one of her strong and well-shaped, gloved hands she carried a traveling bag of black leather.

A big and sunburned young man in boots and corduroys hastened to her. He raised his broad-rimmed hat, smiled, took the bag, and pressed her hand as though he was very glad to see her.

"Bill Dale!" she cried joyously above the roar of the passing train. "Bill Dale, it's you!"

"Sure, it's me!" laughed Dale. "How good you look! I can hardly believe it's you."

"But it is," she smiled. "Tell me: what do you think the outcome o' your trial is going to be?"

Dale noted that her English had improved, and it was gratifying to him. As for the trial—

"I don't know," he said. "But Major Bradley thinks I'll come clear. He believes that somebody that was hidden on the moutainside above us shot Ball to save me. By Heck hinted that he knew that this was the case; and he intimated that I would stand a better chance of acquittal than anybody else would stand, and that if I received a sentence the right man would come forward with a confession. I have an idea that By Heck himself killed Adam Ball—that is, if I didn't do it."

"And Cale Moreland—wasn't it fine for him to do what he done for you, Bill Dale? How are you gettin' along with the mine?"

"First rate," Dale answered, brightening at once. "We're shipping now. And we're getting a smashing price for every ounce of it."

"I see," said the young woman. He went on:

"All of the boys and girls of the Morelands, except the very little ones, are in school at Cartersville, and they're learning fast. When our borrowed capital is paid back, the Moreland families are going to buy farms lying near Cartersville and go to them. A big lowland farm close to good schools and a good little town—well, there are worse places on earth. Pity poor David Moreland can't know about it."

"I'd say!"

She hung her head. She was thinking, as she had so often thought before, of her own benighted people.

"And the Littlefords?" she murmured. It had slipped past her lips. Dale and the Morelands owed the Littlefords nothing.

Dale understood, and he gave her a sympathetic glance.

"A few of the boys and girls of the Littlefords are going to school in Cartersville, perhaps one from each family," he told her. "It is rather expensive, you know, on account of the boarding, and they can't afford to send all their children. However, I think—ultimately—your people will have their chance for education, too."

"But it won't do much good to educate one out o' each-family," said Elizabeth. "They'd come straight back here when they got through with their schoolin', and soon fo'git—I mean forget!—it all. If they make their learnin' pay 'em anything, they'll have to stay where they can use it."

She began to stare absently toward her well-shod feet.

"Are you ready to go?" Dale asked.

Elizabeth Littleford raised her head with a slight jerk and said rather awkwardly:

"Has the valley changed much?"

"Not very much," answered Dale. "There's a new log church, where an old minister named Ashby Cross preaches the gospel of straight walking and human kindliness every Sunday. Henderson Goff isnt here any more, but he sent me his address in case we wanted to sell the mine! The Torreys have gone back to Jerusalem cove and Hatton's hell, and the Balls are as quiet as mice. These, I believe, are all the changes worth mentioning."

Together they set out and walked, without saying much, to the crest of David Moreland's mountain, and there they halted. The autumn sun, a great red ball of fire, was just setting beyond the majestic Big Pine.

Dale pointed to a long, moss-covered slab of brown sandstone.

"Let's sit down there and rest," he suggested. "You're tired, Babe, I know. Don't mind my calling you 'Babe,' do you?"

She looked at him as though she were surprised at his asking that. They sat down.

Bill Dale suddenly leaned toward her and took one of her hands; and he didn't take it as Jimmy Fayne had done—as though he were afraid of it.

"You know I love you, don't you Babe?"

"I've been believin' it," she told him after a moment of painful silence. She was a trifle pale now. "But it—Bill Dale, it somehow don't seem just right for you to love me. Because I'm such a pore little nobody. I'm as ignorant as sin; and I hain't—haven't even got good manners. But—but if you love, if you're sure you do, tell me why!

There came another minute of painful silence.

"Because," said Dale, speaking slowly, "you have always seemed to be one of my own kind. You seem real, to me. I was so sick of artificialities in women that I loved you the moment I saw you. I know you are primitive, but I am primitive, too. And you weren't calling yourself 'Ma-a-am-mah' to a d—d poodle. . . .

"Major Bradley," he went on, "feels sure that I will be acquitted. If it turns out like that, I want you to marry me at once. Tell me—will you, Babe?"

How boyishly impatient he was. Was he afraid he would lose her by waiting?

"You love me, don't you, Babe?" he pursued.

She faced him with the sudden, queer light of a tragedy in her eyes. But she didn't speak. He pressed her hand until it hurt and demanded:

"You do, don't you, Babe?"

"Yes," she told him, in a voice that he barely heard.

"Then why won't you marry me?"

She didn't answer. She wouldn't answer.

* * * * * * * *

The day of the trial dawned clear, with the snap of autumn in the air. The courthouse was filled to its capacity within fifteen minutes after the doors were thrown open. Every man who had a rifle was forced to leave it behind with the sheriff's deputies; a company of the state's militia was there, and each member of it had a hundred rounds of ball cartridges in his belt—the authorities were taking no chances.

Amid a breathless hush, the wheels of the law began to move. Caleb Moreland quickly told what he had to say, and backed it up with proof; he brought out a perfect alibi. The judge and the jury frowned and smiled in the same instant. Dale went forward and took his place. He pleaded "Not Guilty." A little later the state introduced its evidence and rested.

The counsel for the defense, patrician and soldier-like, immaculate from his toes to the crown of his head, went eagerly to his feet. He had fully prepared himself, and he delivered his argument with an eloquent and forceful swing. It was plain that the jury was favorably impressed by the words of this man who never accepted a case unless he was absolutely sure that his client was in the right.

Major Bradley hinged his argument on the mysterious third shot. If Dale's bullet had killed Adam Ball, would not Adam Ball have been shot squarely or at least nearly squarely from the front? As it was, the Goliath had been shot straight through the temples! That third shot had been fired by some hidden friend of Dale's, the major declared, and it had been done for the purpose of saving Dale's life. Ball had been in the act of playing a cowardly trick; he had killed a man in North Carolina by just such a trick—and he had boasted of it.

The attorney for the state made a rejoinder that almost favored the defendant. Then the court charged the jury, and the twelve good men retired.

The jury was out not more than twenty minutes, but to Elizabeth Littleford it was an age of torture.

The twelve men filed slowly in and faced the judge, who turned austere eyes upon them and asked:

"Gentlemen of the jury, have you reached a verdict?"

They had. Elizabeth Littleford's head swam as she bent forward to catch the foreman's words—

"Not guilty!"

A wild shout rose from the leathery throat of the happy By Heck. The Morelands and the Littlefords cheered until they were hoarse. Sheriff Tom Flowers had difficulty in quieting the tumult. Bill Dale shook hands until his shoulders ached. The Balls and their relatives, bitter with resentment and hatred, stole out, were given their rifles, and went toward the big hills with the eye of the miltia hard upon them.

Then the Morelands and the Littlefords and the Hecks, with Dale and his mining man Hayes, came out, and they, too, started for the big hills.

Dale had hired a horse and a side saddle for Ben Littleford's daughter, and the two rode in each other's company on the journey home. When they were well into the mountains, Dale drew his horse over close to that of his companion.

"As soon as I can build and furnish ——" he began, when Elizabeth interrupted:

"We're ridin' too fast. We're too much ahead o' the others. One o' them Balls might try to pick you off with his rifle gun."

"Not much danger of that," Dale replied. "The Balls have already been warned about sniping; your father told them that their very name would be scoured off the earth if there was any sniping. Besides, By Heck is acting as advance guard somewhere ahead of us."

He continued, "As soon as I can build and furnish a little house out near the mine, I want you to marry me, Babe. Will you?"

Elizabeth Littleford seemed not to have heard.

"Will you, Babe?"

She faced him sadly. He saw in her hazel eyes the same queer light of tragedy that he had seen there a day or two before; and now, as then, he wondered what it could mean.

"Tell me, Babe!"

Her head fell forward. The sunlight found glints of gold in her thick chestnut-brown hair. She was silent for a moment; then her voice came dully:

"I'd better not marry you, Bill Dale."

Dale sat up straight and rigid in his saddle and stared hard at her solemnly beautiful profile. He could hardly believe that he had heard correctly. He knew she loved him. She had told him that she loved him. Then why wouldn't she marry him? He tried to reason it out, and the attempt made his brain ache; he was unable to reason. He knew only that she was all of the future to him, all of the world to him, and—that she had refused to marry him.

When they were within two miles of home, Dale went suddenly white and caught her almost rudely by a wrist.

"Is it Jimmy Fayne?" he demanded hotly.

She gave him a reproachful glance and said nothing. He flung her hand from him angrily.

Dale did not speak again until they had entered the broad valley that was home to him. Somehow he felt limp now. The great wave of anger had passed.

"I guess you are too good for me," he said. There was weakness in his voice, and it was the first weakness she had ever known in him.

"Will you always think of me as the finest and most beautiful woman in the world?" she asked.

"Always."

"It's the best I can hope for," murmured Elizabeth.

"What do you mean?"

"It's the best I can hope for," Elizabeth repeated as though she were talking to herself.

They rode on in silence.

* * * * * * * *

There was no sleep for Bill Dale that night. The sweetness of his liberty had all been taken away by Babe Littleford's refusal to marry him. He became bitter toward her again. She had been exceedingly unfair to him: while she really loved him, she was going to marry Jimmy Fayne because he had so much money. She was ungrateful to him: it was through him that she was being educated, being lifted out of her uncouth and illiterate self and set on a higher social and intellectual plane. All he had ever heard of the so-called unfathomable mystery of womankind he now believed, and more. All this, of course, was unworthy. But Bill Dale was intensely human, and to be human is to be unworthy.

"Will You Always Think of Me as the Finest and Most Beautiful Woman in the World?" She Asked.

It turned cold that night. A little before noon of the next day, By Heck stepped into the Moreland Coal company's office.

Dale looked wearily up from his littered desk.

"I am very much obliged to you for shooting Adam Ball, By."

"It's h—l, Bill, ain't it?"

"What?"

Heck leaned over and rested his knotty hands on the muzzle of the inevitable rifle.

"Whatever it is you're a-grievin' about, o' course. Babe Littleford she went back to yore home town this mornin', Bill. Sort o' quare, I thought, 'at you never went with her over to the switch. Sort o' quare, too, 'at she never rid over on the little ingyne instid o' walkin'. But mebbe she was afeard o' gittin' her fine city clo'es all smutted up. Say, Bill, old boy, I wisht I may drap dead in my tracks ef you don't look like a d—d corpst, igod. It haf to be h—l, or you wouldn't grieve about it. 'Smatter? Babe?"

Dale rose and glared at By Heck.

"I'm going to have the truth, By; now get that. Did you, or did you not, kill Adam Ball to save me?"

By Heck realized that he would have to be very cunning if he evaded the question now. Bill Dale, his god, would not be put off longer.

So By Heck answered: "I wisht I may drap dead this minute and turn into a cross-eyed mink with a green tail and pink eyes; I wisht the devil may take me and spend ten thousand etarnities a-sticking' red-hot, peppercoated pitchforks in me and not let me have any tobacker; I wisht I may be struck blind and deef and dumb and paralyzed and ha' my tongue cut out and my ears and toe-nails tore off—ef I killed Adam Ball to save you or anybody else."

And then, having answered, he favored Dale with an odd look, took up his rifle and strode out of the office humming:

"When I die, don't bury me deep
Put no tombstone at my head and feet
Put a bear's jawbone in my right hand——"

"But he's the biggest liar in the state," muttered Dale, turning back to his desk.

He closed his desk, and he didn't work any more that day. Babe Littleford had gone without even bothering to tell him good-bye!

CHAPTER XVI.

Confession

If the impulsive, fighing Bill Dale could have heard across the intervening miles the conversation that took place in his old home the next evening, he would probably have followed Ben Littleford's daughter by the next train if he had had to hold it up at the point of an honest blue gun in order to get aboard it.

John K. Dale and his wife had gone into the library with Elizabeth at her request. The three sat down facing each other. The younger woman was ill at ease; she was glad that the lights were subdued and soft. When the silence had become heavy, she straightened in her chair and blurted out falteringly:

"Bill asked me to m-marry him, and I wouldn't do it. I—I thought maybe I—I ought to tell you."

The Dales exchanged glances; then they looked back at Elizabeth Littleford. Dale smiled a fatherly smile. Mrs. Dale's eyes narrowed. The old stiffness rose within her and began to make stubborn war against her more recently acquired common sense.

"Have you quarreled?" she asked.

"No."

'Well," old Dale said bluntly, "what's wrong?"

"It isn't his fault," Elizabeth told them. "I'm a savage," she went on desperately—"and he isn't my kind."

John K. Dale retired very early that night. When the sound of his footsteps had died away, his wife bent toward Elizabeth and said curiously:

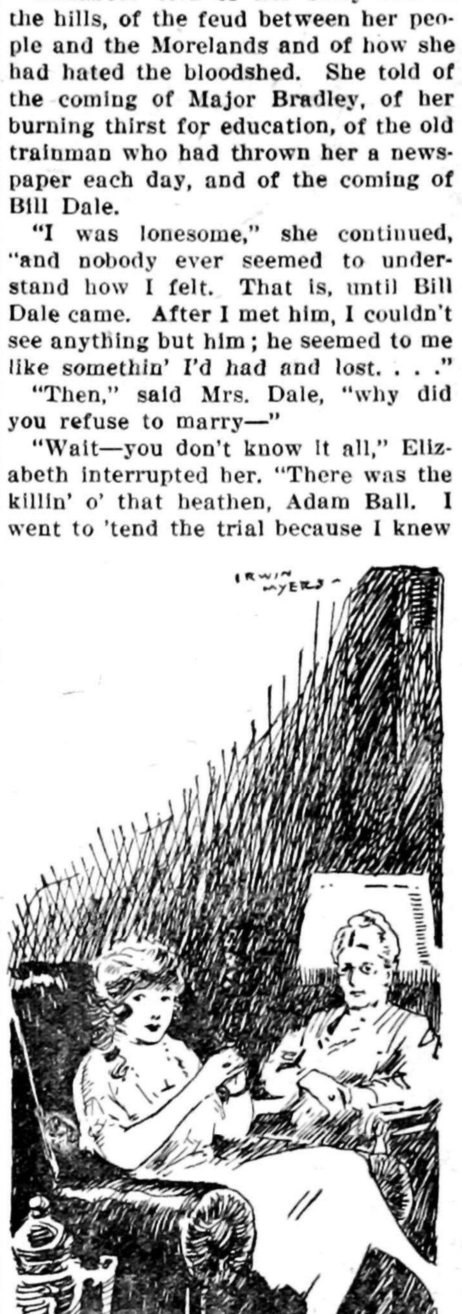
"Why did you call yourself a savage?"

Elizabeth told of her early life in the hills, of the feud between her people and the Morelands and of how she had hated the bloodshed. She told of the coming of Major Bradley, of her burning thirst for education, of the old trainman who had thrown her a newspaper each day, and of the coming of Bill Dale.

"I was lonesome," she continued, "and nobody ever seemed to understand how I felt. That is, until Bill Dale came. After I met him, I couldn't see anything but him; he seemed to me like somethin' I'd had and lost. . . ."

"Then," said Mrs. Dale, "why did you refuse to marry—"

"Wait—you don't know it all," Elizabeth interrupted her. "There was the killin' o' that heathen, Adam Ball. I went to 'tend the trial because I knew



"Then," Said Mrs. Dale, "Why Did You Refuse to Marry—"

I could clear your son if Major Bradley couldn't. You see, Mrs. Dale, I happened to know who did kill Adam Ball, and I meant to tell if it was necessary.

"On the mornin' of the killin' Bill had started up the river by himself. It was dangerous for him to go off like that, on account o' them Balls and Torreys. Back in the Big Pine country there is a tall, thin man named Sam Heck. He's a big eater, an awful liar, and a worshiper of Bill Dale. Sam heard my father say it was dangerous, and he whispered: 'I'll jest sneak through the laurels and gyard Bill from ahind him.' I heard him say it, Mrs. Dale.

"So he went sneakin' along the foot o' the north end o' David Moreland's mountain, with his rifle in his hand, to guard your son. Bill didn't know he was bein' followed, because Heck is as crafty as a cat. I got nervous about Bill, so I went into the laurels and followed Sam Heck. When I overtook him, he was standin' behind a clump o' sheep laurel and lookin' toward the river.

"I whispered, 'Where's Bill?'

"He said, 'Be still, Babe!' And then he thumbed his rifle's hammer back without a sound.

"I looked toward the river and saw Bill Dale a-walkin' up the nearest bank, and I saw Black Adam slip behind a tree not far away. Bill saw Adam, and he slipped behind a tree, too. Adam shot at Bill's hat, and teased Bill. Bill shot at Adam's hat—and then Adam Ball jumped up groanin' like he was done for, and fell, all a-twistin', to the ground. But he wasn't hit. He put his gun out by the tree to kill Bill as soon as he showed himself. It was one o' his old tricks."

Elizabeth Littleford raised her head slowly and went on in a voice that was much shaken:

"I had always talked against killin', and yet I stood there and begged Sam Heck to finish him. The rest happened in no time. Ball was already a-lookin' along his sights. Bill Dale was nearly out in the open. I—" she faltered, and then came a rush of words: "I wouldn't marry him without tellin' him, because it wouldn't be fair to him; and if I told him, he—he wouldn't have me. The woman he marries mustn't be a—a s-savage."

She stopped and stared at Mrs. Dale almost defiantly. Her head was high, and her hands were clasped in her lap so hard that they trembled.

"I think you have made a mountain out of a molehill, my dear," the older woman said gently. 'What you did was right, not wrong; any good woman would have done just what you did, Elizabeth, I am sure."

Elizabeth Littleford faced Mrs. John K. Dale squarely. There was a strange glow in her eyes.

"But I haven't told you everything," she murmured—"I took Sam Heck's rifle from him, and killed Adam Ball myself."

CHAPTER XVII.

Bill Dale Laughs.

Bill Dale sat thinking of what he had done there in the Big Pine country. From the stone-and-clay chimneys of the cabins of the Littlefords on the other side of the river the howling wind snatched sprays of blue wood-smoke. The Morelands had gone to farms lying around Cartersville in the lowland, on each of which a fair-sized first payment had been made. the borrowed capital was to remain borrowed for another year. The Morelands were already losing their outlandishness and growing into universal respect. David Moreland's dream was at last being realized.

Then Dale frowned heavily. If only he could do as much for Babe's people! But he couldn't. The men of the Littlefords still worked the coal mine. They received almost twice the customary wages, but even that wouldn't buy them farms and educate their children.

Under his eyes lay two unanswered letters from his parents. He found little pleasure in answering their letters, for he was still somewhat bitter toward them—toward his father because of his father's ill treatment of David Moreland and David Moreland's people; toward his mother because she had let him go hungry for mother-love as a baby, as a child, as a boy, and as a man; toward them both because he had been reared a do-nothing.

The door opened suddenly, and By Heck came stamping in with a gust of cold air at his back. He carried in one hand the mail satchel; in the other was his ever-present rifle. After throwing the satchel to the floor at Dale's feet, he turned to the glowing wood stove.

"I'm dang nigh friz, Bill," he chattered. "My gosh, I couldn't be no colder'n what I em ef I'd ha' clim' the nawth pole neck-ed. Say, Bill, why'n't ye burn coal 'stid o' wood? Igod, it's hotter."

"Coal is worth money. Wood isn't."

Dale ran through the mail hastily. He threw aside a letter from the Alexander Crayfield Coal corporation, which took the entire output of the mine at an extraordinary figure, and picked up a letter which bore the postmark of his home city.

It was from Babe Littleford. Since he paid so little attention to the letters of his parents, they had requested her to write to him—they wanted him to come home for Christmas dinner. Wouldn't he come?

He arose and paced the office floor for two or three minutes, then he sat down at his desk and dashed off a letter that contained only two sentences.

By Heck sat beside the stove and watched his god with thoughtful eyes. He understood, he believed. How any woman on earth could turn down a man like Bill Dale was utterly beyond him. By Heck was a great deal like a good-natured dog. . . .

If Bill would only laugh, it would be good for him. It had been so long since he had heard Bill laugh. By Heck decided that he would make Bill Dale laugh.

"Old boy?"

"Well?"

"Do ye want me to tell ye a funny tale?" drawled Heck. He barely heard the answer:

"I guess I don't mind, By."

Heck's sympathy made him gulp. But he swallowed the lump that came up in his throat and began bravely:

"One time the' was a feller named Smith. Odd name, Bill, ain't it? 'Hossfly' Smith, they called him, 'cause it was said 'at he could easy shoot a hossfly offen a hoss's ear and never break hide on the animile. He was a hellion, too. One time Hossfly, he was a-tryin' to git app'inted the chairman o' some sort o' politics doin's, and on that same day he was a-drinkin' sort o' tol'able heavy. They agreed to make him the temp'rary chairman, but Hossfly, he didn't want that. So he hops right up in the middle o' the meetin', and he hollers out and says:

"'Feller citizens,' he says, 'I want to be the permanent chairman! I ain't a-goin' to act in the cap-acity of a durned temp'rary chairman; I absod—n-lutely ain't!'

"His old inemy, Eb Wright, he yells back and says smart-like: 'Set down thar, Hossfly,' says Eb—'you're drunk, and you don't know the difference a-tween temp'rary and permanent!'

"Well, they knowed Eb had it a-comin' to him right then, and they listened fo' it. Hossfly, he addresses the whole meetin', and this here is what Hossfly says:

OH WHERE, OH WHERE HAS MY LITTLE DOG GONE?

Who's got our dog? Doggone it, we want that dawg back. Or we want to know what the doggone has become of our dawg. If anyone has seen him, or knows where he is, or can tell us what has become of him, we shall appreciate it very much. He is a little white dog, so high, with some brown about the ears and head, with a full length tail, which wags to the name of "Gyp." He isn't worth four cents war tax for the blue blood that's in him, but he is worth ten dollars to the party who brings him in to us immediately if not sooner. And no questions asked.

ALEXANDER DEPARTMENT NOW

This week the Independent begins a special feature in the Alexander Department on page six. This page will be devoted each week to the interests of Alexander, and we believe will be good reading and of interest to Bemond people as well. The time is here when newspapers in the small town have got to go; they cannot pay out; and thru newspapers in the larger towns adjacent the small town will be given representation.

The Independent now carries each week departments for Meservey and Alexander. This means a larger and more extended territory that the Indepentdent reaches and covers, and is additional territory for the Independent advertiser. The merchants an opportunity to tell their customers of the two towns mentioned are given thru the Independent what they have to sell. The Independent covers the most territory.

COMMUNITY WELFARE MEETS

The Community Welfare club will meet this week Friday, November 18th., instead of next week. The Thanksgiving program will be given in charge of Mrs. G. F. McBurney.

Indications of Hard, Cold Winter

NOVEMBER—PERFECT PACKAGE MONTH

During the month of November, the American Railway association, acting for practically all the railroads in the United States, together with the American Railway Express company are putting on a campaign for better packing, better marking, better containers, and trying hard to get rid of the "second hand" containers for shipments

The Chamber of Commerce in the larger cities and towns are co-operating with these two companies for "November—The Perfect Package Month." Anyone can see that The railroads and factories have made a big gain both in the saving of lives and property, thru their "No Accident Weeks," so then comes the two companies mentioned with the campaign for perfect packages and they can no doubt save a great deal in money, delays and damages by putting forth every effort to get the shipping public to use good judgement in packing, wrapping and marking packages for shipment.

Whether the Chamber of Commerce here will co-operate with the local officers of the express companies we have not been advised, but if they follow wisely in the steps of others they will lend a willing hand.

The local officers of the express company in this town are ready and willing to help or assist shippers in any way by advising the best and most economical way in preparing shipments, either for a short distance or long.—Contributed.

YOUNG LAD HERE HAS COMPLETE WIRELESS OUTFIT

Caryl McIntyre, son of Mrs. Tom Finn who recently moved back to Belmond from Ackley, is a licensed wireless operator and has at their present home in the old Methodist parsonage, a complete wireless outfit rigged up with which he will soon be sending and receiving messages from hundreds of miles around.

The lad, who is about 16 years of age, has about $300 in electrical and wireless apparatus and has one of the neatest amateur plants to be found anywhere around. At Ackley he could receive messages from as far as Arlington, from which place he used to receive the time every night. With the power that he has here he thinks that he can send up to several hundred miles, and receive from long distances.

The outfit is attracting a great deal of attention among the boys of the town, naturally. It might prove to be a mighty handy thing in case of a robbery here, for instance, when, if the communcating wires leading from the town were cut—as they usually are—a "wireless" could be sent notifying police authorities of the crime and a great deal of time saved in running down the criminals. Young McIntyre expects to make the wireless his life business.

E. L. Bailey and family have moved from the Longley residence where they have been living the past summer, and are now nicely settled in the Congregational parsonage, which was recently vacated by the Schooler family.

SMOOTH GRAFTER FOILED BY CLARION FARM WOMAN

News: A smooth grafter who was working in this vicinity last week was foiled in an attempt to defraud a well known woman near town out of $15 thru an order blank which was, in effect, a check. He appeared as an agent for an enlarged portrait concern. He had secured an order and asked the woman to sign it. She did so, and asked for a duplicate before turning it over to the agent. This the stranger refused to give, and then the woman looked over the order carefully and saw that she had in effect, signed an order and also a check, all that was lacking being the name of the bank. She tore the papers up and ordered the man out of the house and off the place.

People should be very careful in signing any kind of a paper for strangers. Sometimes such signatures turn up as notes or checks.

FREERK FROHLING

Freerk Frohling was born on the seventh of January 1847 in the town of Weener, Eastfriesland, Germany. He came to this country in 1873 and settled in the vicinity of German Valley, Ill., where two years later he was joined in marriage to Frederika Frohing. The couple lived near German Valley for the space of 10 years and then came west in 1885 and settled on a farm southeast of Belmond. Twenty seven years of their married life were spent on this farm amid the toils, failures and disappointments as well as the joys and the encouragements incidental to farm life. Nine years ago this past spring they retired and moved to town to spend the remaining years enjoying the fruits of their labors.

Altho the discease had for several years noticed some disorder in his throat it was not until last March that it really seemed serious and requiring medical attention. It was discovered that he was suffering from cancer of the throat and that it was beyond the power of medical and surgical skill. Loving hands and modern science, however, ministered to his relief. Scarcely two weeks before his death he was taken to our local hospital where the surgeon in charge performed a successful operation to avoid slow death by starvation. But the cancerous growth had developed to such an extent that death came unexpectedly towards evening of Sunday, Nov. 6 at the age of seventy four years, nine months and 19 days.

There remain to mourn his death the bereaved widow, an adopted son, Carl Greenfield, a sister in Germany, another sister in the state of Oregon, a brother in Chicago, and a host of distant relatives and many friends.

The family desires herewith to tender their heartfelt gratitude to the many friends and neighbors who have stood by them in their great hour of grief and have shown their sympathy by the contribution of flowers.

The body was laid to rest last Thursday in Franklin Grove cemetery. Funeral services were conducted in the Methodist church, Rev. Waalkes officiating, Rev. Wilkinson assisting at the church.

CHRISTMAS SEAL CAMPAIGN STARTS DEC. 1ST

Des Moines, Ia., Nov. 17, Iowa's annual sale of Christmas seals, which are sold every December to finance the state share in the nation wide fight on tuberculosis, is being organized in every county of the state, with leading public health workers and organizations planning to offer the seals to the public in every county.

The goal fixed is ten seals per capita in Iowa, and from the proceeds public health work of various descriptions will be financed in most of the counties of the state.

The seals are handled thru the Iowa Tuberculosis association, in cooperation with organizations in every county. From fifty to seventy per cent of the amount received from the sale of seals is retained in the home community. These funds are used in co-operation with the Red Cross, or thru the schools, or by local public welfare organizations for the financing of anti-tuberculosis, public health or child welfare work of almost every description.

Last year more than $70,000 worth of seals were sold, and this year it is hoped that at least double this amount will be sold.

The seal sale has the endorsement of the American Red Cross, of the American Federation of Labor and of the National Federation of Women's clubs. The seals are sold in every state of the Union as a means of financing anti-tuberculosis work.

Seals will be on sale about December 1 and the sale will continue until Christmas time.

PRESIDENT HARDING URGES RED CROSS SUPPORT

The following statement by President Harding, urging universal support of the annual Roll Call of the American Red Cross which begins generally throughout the country Nov. 11, continueing through Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 24, was issued from the White House tonight:

TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE: As president of the United States of America and as president of the American Red Cross, I announce that the Red Cross annual roll call will begin on Armistice Day. November 11, and continue through Thanksgiving day, November, 24, and I designate November 13 as Red Cross Sunday.

I recommend ministers and priests of all congregations to stress the gospel of service on November 13 and I invite and urge my fellow citizens to accept the entire period of the Roll Call as an occasion for rededication of themselves to the principles and practice of service. The American Red Cross is both the volunteer and semi-official medium through which our people may appropriately express their patriotic and humane desires to render practical assistance to their soldiers and sailors, to their fellow citizens in civilian life, and to those peoples of other lands who have a human claim on the sympahtetic concern of our own people.

The American Red Cross has kept faith with the principles which gave it birth and with the obligations laid upon it by Congressional Charter "to act in matters of voluntary relief and in accord with the military and naval authorities as a medium of communication between the people of the United States and their Army and Navy;" after a notable war service, it, in conjunction with the veterans' bureau and other activities, stands by our veterans and their families in a period of painful reconstruction, in which, as too many of us have been prone to forget, thousands are in pressing need, not only of governmental attention and assistance, but also of those supplementary acts of human kindness which only volunteer mercy can supply.

By systematic and scientific plans and equipment for relief from disaster, and by prompt response to many urgent calls throughout the past year, the American Red Cross has fulfilled another requirement of its Cngressional Charter "to continue and carry on a system of national

Planning to Operate the Facto[ry] the Coming

Stockholders Meeting He[ld] November 14th Indor[se] Big Bond Issu[e]

IT IS NOW UP TO ALL

Future of Company Now [...] Squarely Before Stockho[lders] and Creditors

The Iowa Valley Sugar Co. is completing plans for the issu[e] approximately one million doll[ars] bonds, with which to reorgan[ize] company for operation.

The 14th of the month a stoc[kholders'] meeting was held in the city Rochester, New York. At this [meet]ing the plans for issuing the [...] dollar loan were discussed and [...] upon favorably by the stockh[olders] and their representatives who [...] present.

Monday of next week a direc[tors'] meeting of the company will be h[eld] at the company offices here at whi[ch] time the directors will take up [the] proposition of the bonds and it is [ex]pected that they too will act favor[ably] upon the plan.

The present plan, as outlined in [a] recent letter to the stockholders, [is] to issue bonds to the sum necess[ary] to take up the claim of all credi[tors] holding one hundred dollars or [...] against the company, and to take [...] the Dyer company mortgage. W[hen] this has been accomplished, then [as] the Independent understands it, [the] company plans to sell sufficient of [...] bonds to realize a sum of aprox[imate]ly $150,000, with which they [...] assured of operation next year.

The company must depend mo[re or] less upon the stockholders and [cred]itors to take up some of these bon[ds] and assure the '22 operation. It [is] up to the stockholders and the creditors as to what shall be done a[fter] the various claims as mentioned h[ave] been taken care of. The issuance [of] these bonds to cover the claims [is] not paying them off now, it is mer[ely] extending the time from a year [or] less to five years. To operate ne[xt] year the company must have cash, a[nd] it expects to raise this cash fro[m] the sale of these bonds, which w[ill] doubtless be discounted to a figu[re] where they will make an attracti[ve] and profitable buy.

By January 1st the company w[ill] probably know whether they are [to] operate next season or not, and [the] stockholders will know whether they are to realize $200,000 or whether they are to lose it. The next month or six weeks will tell the tale.

It is entirely up to those who ha[ve] put their money into the company as stockholders or creditors. They can just about save or lose their money according to the way they act, and it is as easy one way as the other.

WALL LAKE FIGHT SEEMS TO BE IN HUNTERS' FAVOR

The fight over Wall Lake which has been raging the past month or two appears to be going in favor of the hunters now. Recently Secretary of State Ramsay and Treasurer Burbank visited the scene of battle and inspected the lake front and the lake, and Secretary Ramsay has been quoted as saying that the parties from Waterloo who have been trying to obtain a corner on the lake for their own personal benefit would have another guess coming and the lake shore would be open to the hunters of Iowa without further cost. The Waterloo parties, it is claimed, were seeking to obtain unreasonable rental privileges on ground and huts at the lake, and even charging for the privilege of hunting there.

IOWA PRESS ASSOCIATION

OUR SECOND BIRTHDAY

With this issue the Independent i two years old.

That is a momentous event—to us.

To us it means that our two years of hard work have counted for something worth while. Two years ago the Independent was started with a very little cash, but a large amount of hope and faith in the town and community. We feel that these hopes and faith have been justified, that the Independent has reached a place where it can be of service to the town and community. While we still have "a very little cash"—like most everyone else—we feel that the Independent is established on a firm foundation and we look forward to the future with the same hope and faith with which we started.

We feel that any measure of success which the Independent may have attained has been due more to the cooperation of our readers and advertisers than to anything which we may have done. Their friendliness and boosting has been of more value than they have realized, and we are most sincerely grateful. To them is due the credit, if any there be, for without them the Independent would have gone the way of many a new venture; it could never have survived much less have grown.

From a beginning of 400 subscribers the Independent has increased its family to its present circulation of eleven hundred or more; from a narrow circle of territory it has extended to cover everything from beyond Rowan to beyond Meservey. Every one of these subscribers has been a booster and a friend, and the publisher considers each of them as such. They have made possible the result, have made the fight worth while.

To the Independent advertisers we can only say that we have tried to give the support and the service which their co-operation and friendliness in all ways has warranted, and we feel that we have a long ways to go yet to give them as much as they have given us. Their patronage has made possible whatever improvement the Independent may have made. We have tried to give service, to bring them results, and we shall endeavor in the future to be more worthy of the patronage they have shown us and the help they have given.

The Independent set sail upon the unchartered sea of business life a frail bark, with every sail set to catch the passing breeze. That it has escaped the sunken reefs of disaster and avoided the rocks of destruction has been due to the readers and advertisers, and to them the publisher takes this method of extending his personal thanks.

The Independent is far from what the publisher wants it to be and what he hopes to make it. We wish that the Independent may serve the community, that it may bring to the community and the town those things which the communiy needs to progress and expand. It shall be the aim of this paper to do those things, to bring to the community all that is good and of value. A newspapers' business is to serve and that is our aim. We want to serve you all, individually and collectively, to the best of our ability. We want to give our readers the news, our advertisers the readers, and to the town and the community service. Help us to do them. With your co-operation we shall in the future endeavor to bring about the things that we need, to destroy those which are harmful, and in so doing we will give you a bigger and better home newspaper.

SPIKING THE GUNS

There is in session now at the national capital a conference which may go down in history as the greatest thing that was ever achieved by any nation: The Disarmament Conference of the five great nations of the world.

Secretary Hughes announced in his address Saturday the principles of the great plan, which, if carried out, will mean more toward universal and complete peace than any other thing that has ever been proposed. Briefly Huges proposed to the delegates of the other nations that they wreck the battleships which they now have in process of building, that they agree to stop all further construction for a period of ten years, and that each nation shall have a limit to the size of their armaments.

To make plain the part that the United tates is willing to take in the program, he declared that this nation Swould dismantle, scrap a total tonnage of almost 850,000 in battleships and other fighting craft. This is about 250,000 tons more than Great Britian has been asked to scrap, and almost 600,000 more than Japan.

That agreement to scrap battleships of almost 250,000 tons more than England was a master stroke of diplomacy, and places the other great nations in a place where they cannot help but agree. The United States has completed or in process of completion $330,000,000 in ships of the fighting line which we agree to scrap and throw in the junk heap if the others will do their part. Should they do this, and agree to the ten-year period, then wars will have become practically a thing of the past, for no nation will be left with enough of a fleet to start an offensive warfare, and at the end of the ten years no nation which has had a taste o. taxes which do not go for wars past or future can ever be gotten to put up money for big armaments again.

Let us all sincerely hope and pray that this conference comes to a successful conclusions, that the greatest nations of the earth will agree to agree on the terms set forth, and that the peoples of the earth may in the years to come be unburdened of the load that they have carried on their weary shoulders for ages, since history began. It seems a dream too good to be true, yet is there any just or good reason why it should not be? Some there may be who will call it an idealist's dream, unpractical and impossible; so was it said of the airship, the telephone, the wireless, of everything new. Because a thing has always been is no reason for its existance. That there always have been wars is no good reason why there should not be a stop put to them, and every true Christian, every real and faithful American, will hope that the time has come when they may be stopped, and will use their every effort to help.

The Ideal Purgative

As a purgative, Chamberlain's Tablets are the exact thing required. Strong enough for the most robust, mild enough for children. They cause an agreeable movement of the bowels without any of that terrible griping. They are easy and pleasant to take and agreeable in effect.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

CLIPPINGS

Miss Violet Starnes was up from Belmond visiting Klemme friends.—Times.

Mrs. Pat Barry and Miss McNamara of Belmond were Klemme visitors yesterday.—Times.

Miss Marian Luick of Belmond came Saturday evening for an over Sunday visit at the Charlie Luick home in the country.—Times.

Joe Starnes and family spent Sunday visiting friends at Belmond.—Times.

Last Friday forenoon about eleven o'clock while Peter Erdman was husking corn his team started to run away and while attempting to stop them he was knocked down and trampled, receiving a crushed spinal column and a fractured shoulder blade. From these injuries Mr. Erdman died Saturday at nine o.clock.—Reporter.

Lights have been placed in the alleys of the business district and there will be several lights burning all night on the main street of the town hereafter. This is done as a precaution against burglartes and is considered a big help to the nightwatchman, and we think it was a very wise move on the part of the city council. —Garner Signal.

Last Thursday was Geo. Balridge's umpty-ump birthday anniversary and unknown to him the family planned a little surprise for the occasion by inviting the following relatives to spend the evening with them: Messrs. and Mesdames J. W. Baldridge, I. Shaffer, Frank Baldridge and L. Collins from Belmond, C. Scott from Olaf and Lou Baldridge from Belmond The guests brought many good things to eat including two roast geese with all the fixin's to which we are sure George did justice.—Reporter.

Last week Wednesday someone entered the Klemme Creamery thru a window from the boiler room. The thief took a couple of cream cans left by the haulers which then was filled from the vat. A new cream can outside was also taken and that filled. Just how much cream was taken is only guessed at, but it is thought that about three cans full were stolen. The bandit had some heart about him however, for the next night the cream cans were returned.—Times.

Fame will desert you in the twinkling of an eye—but money won't.

A Prounounced Success

The unform success that has attended the use of Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy in the relief and cure of bowel complaints, both children and adults, has brought it to almost universal use, so that it is practically without a rival and as everyone who has used it knows, it is without an equal.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

The greatest single opportunity for most churches is with the youth. Their lives are plastic and moldable. They are the churches of tomorrow. Seventy-five per cent of our net increase in church membership comes thru the church school. Effort expended upon these youths before the age of twenty easily counts for ten times as much as this same effort will after they are 35 years of age. The supreme life decisions which mold their future and determine destiny for most of them are made before the age of 25. Here is a supreme opportunity for the church.

The Sunday school at Rowan is growing, and we need your co-operation and help in this. Be sure and attend every Sunday as we need you and we cannot do without YOU. Our Sunday school is planning great thing for Dec. 24.

Let us keep in mind the Christmas program Dec. 24. This will be a great time for the children. Remember the date.

Remember that the Sunday services at the Cong. church are for you and your friends. Come Sunday the 20th as this will be Motorcar Sunday. "Invite all your friends to attend these services."

There will be union services at the M. E. church Nov. 24, Thanksgiving day. Rev. Nye will give an address "The Thanksgiving of the Present and Future Outlook." Hear this address Thursday morning at 10:30.

The genius of success is still the genius of labor, then faithfulness in little things fits one for heroism when the great trial comes, and then the larger thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do. We cannot dream ourselves into a character, we must forge one.

Remember the Rowan. Cong. church bazaar and supper Dec. 3.

The ladies met at the home of Mrs. Hadley and Mrs. Allen last Monday evening and tied six comforters.

The W C. T. U. meets with Mrs. L. A. McCallum Wednesday, Nov. 16. A good attendance is desired.

Let's all go to church Sunday and try and get the habit then the habit will grow. When you go to church always invite the other fellow to come along.

The first program in connection with the Lyceum course will be given next Saturday evening at seven-thirty by Dr. Parry. Let us all make a special effort to be present.

Mrs. Levi Johnson of Sioux Falls who has been spending the past two weeks at the home of her parents Mr. and Mrs. Florence Fowler, left last Saturday for home. Mrs. Brown of Marengo returned home on Tuesday accompanied by her sister Miss Esther Fowler.

Despite the stormy weather there was a large number of people who patronized the oyster stew supper served by the ladies of the Methodist church last Thursday.

Rowan Methodist Church Notes

The Rev. Harold Tomkinson, pastor of the M. E. church will occupy the pulpit at both services next Sunday his morning subject being "Some things that cannot be bought." At the evening hour he will speak on some timely topic of interest. Of late the church has been full at both the services and the people have been treated to subjects of popular and vital interest. Mr. Tomkinson believes that the pulpit ought to be one of the greatest educational forces in the land and the people who stay away are robbing themselves of rich treasures. Pres. Harding goes to church: Lloyd George goes to church; General Foch goes to church then surely if these men feel the need of christian education and inspiration we ought to feel likewise and more.

Will the friends of Rowan kindly remember Friday, Dec. 9 as being the day for the Big Bazaar and Christmas Social put on by the ladies of the Methodist church. The members of the Aid society are working most strenuously to make this the most successful ale ever held in the church at Rowan.

You can't "do" anybody and still be somebody—if you're found out.

If you watch your step you won't have time to watch others' missteps.

A genius who thinks he is, usually isn't.

The creamery at Klemme was entered and robed one night last week, the thieves making away with about thirty gallons of cream. Why they took the cream when there was plenty of butter handy easier to carry and worth more, is the question, unless it was because they thought that the cream would be easier to dispose of.

Dale Walker of Hampton was a visitor here a couple days last week with his friend Lee Stacy. While here he received word that his mother had died at her home in Hampton. Old Settler Of Franklin County Passes Away

Mrs. Theo. Beenen Dies After Illness Of Little More Than A Week

RESIDENT HERE SINCE 1884

Mrs. Theodore Beenen passed away at her home on November 9th, 1921 after an illness of a little more than a week.

The direct cause of her death was pneumonia.

Mrs. Beenen had been a resident of Franklin county since 1884, when she and her family came from the old country to America.

She died at the age of seventy-three years, eight months and 20 days.

Mrs. Beenen, whose maiden name was Greitze Wildebaer, was born in Landschaftspolder, Eastfriesland, Germany, on February 19th, 1848. There she lived until the time when she set sail for the United States.

She was married in November, 1876 to Theo. W. Beenen who was a widower. This union was blessed with seven children, five boys and two girls. Three of the children preceded their mother in death, one boy in infancy, Klaas in 1918, and Mrs. George Vierkant about two years ago.

Her husband, with whom she had been living for thirty-eight years, passed away in 1914.

Mrs. Beenen is survived by five of her children. They are Wm. at Renwick, Iowa; Anna, Aldrich Theodore and one stepson, Rudolph, all of this place, and one sister who resides at West Bend.

Funeral services were held on November 11th, 1921 at the Reformed church, the Rev. W. J. Heyenga officiating.

The body was laid to rest in the Alexander cemetery beside that of her husband.

The bereaved ones have the sympathy of the entire community in their sad loss.

CLARION HUNTERS FIND THEY COULD SHOOT BEFORE SUNRISE

News: Local hunters who were recently arrested on complaint of a deputy game warden living near Wall Lake and fined, on an alleged charge of having shot at ducks before sunrise, have discovered that there is no such law which prohibited them from doing as they did, and that their conviction was not legal. Their only recourse now would be to take their case into district court, where they could get the return of the money paid in as fine and costs, but they will probably decide to let the matter rest where it is.

The local interpretation of the law, on which their conviction was based, is said to be erroneous by none other than the state game warden, in whose charge the enforcement of the Iowa game laws is placed. Letters quoting the law were written to local sportsmen. The federal law, which takes precedence over the state law, does not prohibit shooting at ducks from land before sunrise. The state law prohibits shooting at ducks from water boats and the like.

Therefore had the hunters stood trial, they would have won out in the end.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Each week the Independent proposes to give to the people of Alexander a page in the Independent wherein Alexander will be exclusively represented.

The Alexander business men and the Independent have reached an agreement regarding the advertising of Alexander, and each week you will find represented on the Alexander Page the bargains and special offers of you home merchants and business men. Look them over carefully, for they mean money saved to you.

Each week you will find in this Department the most news of your Home Community, and we hope that it will prove of interest to you in all ways.

The Independent is logically your home newspaper. Alexander is a live town, a right town, but it is not large enough to support a newspaper of its own—if it was, there would have been one in such a community long ago. We propose to give you newspaper representation thru the Independent in the Alexander Department. It will be a Department devoted exclusively to Alexander, to your merchants' and your own interests. We ask your help to make it a success.

The Independent does not expect to make any financial gain thru the department; the Alexander advertiser does splendidly, but the money derived from that source is only enough to meet the cost of running the Department. We expect to make our gain thru increased circulation, and we make you the following offer to remain in force until December 1st:

The Independent one year for one dollar.

This is half price. We lose money on every subscription at this price, but we will gain it back in the future by the increased circulation which we expect this most unusual offer to bring.

Mail your subscription to the Independent or give to Miss Bell, who will receive it and give you a receipt for a year. Don't delay, for we will be able to send you samples only a few times. Look your Department over, see if you don't think that it is worth a two-cent stamp, and if you do, then send in your subscription at once and get it every week.

DO IT NOW!

NELLIE BELL, AGENT

The Independent expects to run each week an Alexander Department along the same lines as the one this week, and we want to make your Home Department as interesting and as worth while as possible.

To do this we must have and we ask your co-operation. We want to give you NEWS of your own locality and to get it we must have the help of Alexander people.

Miss Nellie Bell will have the news end of the Alexander Department in charge, and the publisher will take it as a personal favor if you will tell her any news that you may happen to know. A correspondent can get some of the news, but nobody can get it all. With your help we will get a big share of it and the more we get the better we will like it—and so will you.

Please give the news to Miss Bell. Help us to make your Home Department as interesting as possible. Let's fill the entire page with ALL ALEXANDER HOME NEWS every week and make the Alexander Department one that will give you satisfaction as well as us. Cooperate with us and we will do the same with you.

There was a wreck on the C. & N. W. near Laurens recently and a car of gasolene was tipped over and broken open. The accident happened near the road, and passing tourists stopped and dipped up the gas and filled their cars. The supply ran out and someone else opened a sealed car and allowed the gas to escape, and that also was dipped up and placed in the waiting cars. At last the conductor of the train came along and the oil dippers skedaddled, leaving their buckets and pails on the ground where the gasolene was.—Humboldt Republican.

Brother King of the Wright County News doubts the Independent's tale of Henry Luick picking 120 to 130 bushels of corn in eight hours. To which we invite Brother King to take a look at the records of Noah Valde of Story City claiming 188 in one working day, and Ernest Anderson of Osce, Iowa, with a claim of 181 bushels. Brother King acts like he came from Missouri, and if he will come over some time the Independent will have Henry remonstrate.

Last Wednesday Rev. Nye and L. A. McCallum and Christopher McCallum attended the ordination of Mr. Mohr, pastor of the Alexander Congregational church. There was a large attendance at this service in the afternoon and evening.

The Ladies Aid will have the sale on the 3rd of Dec. This will be one of the best events of the Ladies Aid this year. Be sure and remember this and hold open the date to attend as we have some nice things in store for you

The greatest single opportunity for most churches is with the youth. Their lives are plastic and moldable. They are the churches of tomorrow. Seventy-five per cent of our net increase in church membership comes thru the church school. Effort expended upon these youths before the age of twenty easily counts for ten times as much as this same effort will after they are 35 years of age. The supreme life decisions which mold their future and determine destiny for most of them are made before the age of 25. Here is a supreme opportunity for the church.

The Sunday school at Rowan is growing, and we need your co-operation and help in this. Be sure and attend every Sunday as we need you and we cannot do without YOU. Our Sunday school is planning great thing for Dec. 24.

Let us keep in mind the Christmas program Dec. 24. This will be a great time for the children. Remember the date.

Remember that the Sunday services at the Cong. church are for you and your friends. Come Sunday the 20th as this will be Motorcar Sunday. "Invite all your friends to attend these services."

There will be union services at the M. E. church Nov. 24, Thanksgiving day. Rev. Nye will give an address "The Thanksgiving of the Present and Future Outlook." Hear this address Thursday morning at 10:30.

The genius of success is still the genius of labor, then faithfulness in little things fits one for heroism when the great trial comes, and then the larger thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do. We cannot dream ourselves into a character, we must forge one.

Remember the Rowan. Cong. church bazaar and supper Dec. 3.

The ladies met at the home of Mrs. Hadley and Mrs. Allen last Monday evening and tied six comforters.

The W C. T. U. meets with Mrs. L. A. McCallum Wednesday, Nov. 16. A good attendance is desired.

Let's all go to church Sunday and try and get the habit then the habit will grow. When you go to church always invite the other fellow to come along.

The first program in connection with the Lyceum course will be given next Saturday evening at seven-thirty by Dr. Parry. Let us all make a special effort to be present.

Mrs. Levi Johnson of Sioux Falls who has been spending the past two weeks at the home of her parents Mr. and Mrs. Florence Fowler, left last Saturday for home. Mrs. Brown of Marengo returned home on Tuesday accompanied by her sister Miss Esther Fowler.

Despite the stormy weather there was a large number of people who patronized the oyster stew supper served by the ladies of the Methodist church last Thursday.

Rowan Methodist Church Notes

The Rev. Harold Tomkinson, pastor of the M. E. church will occupy the pulpit at both services next Sunday his morning subject being "Some things that cannot be bought." At the evening hour he will speak on some timely topic of interest. Of late the church has been full at both the services and the people have been treated to subjects of popular and vital interest. Mr. Tomkinson believes that the pulpit ought to be one of the greatest educational forces in the land and the people who stay away are robbing themselves of rich treasures. Pres. Harding goes to church: Lloyd George goes to church; General Foch goes to church then surely if these men feel the need of christian education and inspiration we ought to feel likewise and more.

Will the friends of Rowan kindly remember Friday, Dec. 9 as being the day for the Big Bazaar and Christmas Social put on by the ladies of the Methodist church. The members of the Aid society are working most strenuously to make this the most successful ale ever held in the church at Rowan.

You can't "do" anybody and still be somebody—if you're found out.

If you watch your step you won't have time to watch others' missteps.

A genius who thinks he is, usually isn't.

The creamery at Klemme was entered and robed one night last week, the thieves making away with about thirty gallons of cream. Why they took the cream when there was plenty of butter handy easier to carry and worth more, is the question, unless it was because they thought that the cream would be easier to dispose of.

FARM BUREAU NEWS

series of meetings which will er every township in Wright coun- has been arranged by the county gent for the purpose of outlining e program of work for the year 22 and for the election of officers the coming year.

Can the farmers of America so or- nize their business that the nation's od supply will be assured to all. his question is foremost in the mind every city man and farmer alike d one which will be decided upon in gree, at least, at the township meet- gs throughout the county.

During the last twelve months the rmers have built in the farm bureau powerful machine—a machine through which they have acomplished much. In four lines they have been articularly active. In organization, n the securing of agricultural legis- ation, in seeking the reduction of freight rates and in the establishment of co-operative marketing enterprises. Through these and other activities farm bureau has become a most rtant factor in the economic wel- fare of the United States.

What the farm bureau will do in the coming twelve months will be de- cided upon at the annual meeting of the various townships throughout Wrigh county. The farm bureau and its officers pride themselves upon the fact that the policies and actions of the organization are determined by the membership—that the farm bu- reau really and truly reflects the wishes of thirteen hundred farmers of Wright county who make up this membership. The old idea of having specialists come out from the exper- imental station and outline the work to be carried out in the county thru- out the year has been replaced by the new system of having the farm- ers decide for themselves what lines of work shall be carried on thru the farm bureau organization.

Every farm bureau member who is interested in the welfare of his community who has suggestions re- garding the program of work for next year and who wishes to have a voice in electing the officers for the coming year is earnestly urged to attend the farm bureau organization meeting in his respective township according to the following schedule:

COUNTY AGENT AT ANNUAL CONFERENCE

R. M. Edwards the local county agent, is at Ames this week attend- ing the annual conference for county agents, home demonstration agents and extension specialists.

One hundred Iowa county agents will come together for a three day conference on November 16, 17 and 18. It is at this time that all county agents will "swap" notes on the ac- tivities of the farm bureau thruout the state. Surely the meeting to- gether of the employed agents of all farm bureaus in the state of Iowa will have a good effect upon the farm bureau work thruout the state. In- deed the county agents should go back to their home counties chuck full of suggestions for carrying on a more effective campaign of county agent work.

There are those who will wonder why it is necessary for the county agent to spend three whole days in attending such a conference. It should be remembered that the field of peration for the county agent is [illegible] extensive and includes scores [illegible] direct be devoted to farm crops soils and animal husbandry. The second day will be given to the county agent round table, which will be the most important session of the three day conference, and the last day to the agricultural economics lectures includ ing marketing, farm tenancy and farm accounting, also lectures on hor- ticulture and agriculture.

HOG CHOLERA SITUATION

Cholera has been gradually closing in on all sides of Wright county and recently several reports have come to the office of herds in the county be- coming sick, some hogs being lost and quite a few being vacinated. The reports of sick hogs, especially of cholera, have come from various sec- tions of the county. It is quite prob- able that there will be an increase of cholera in the next few weeks and there will be little trouble in con- trolling it if proper care is taken to guard against it.

Preventative measures are especial- ly necessary this year due to the scarc ity of hogs and the general tendecy for everyone to hold their hogs longer and put all the corn they can into them. Dr. K. W. Stouder, extension specialist in veterinary medicine at Iowa State College recommends the following measures in the fight against the cholera:

1. Hog lots should be located away from streams and highways. Free range, streams and irrigation canals help in the spread of cholera out- breaks.

2. Don't visit neighbor's hog lots or allow them to visit yours if they have sick hogs. Infection may also be carried by teams and wagons on high ways. Keep dogs at home, for they may carry infection.

3. Isolate for at least two weeks all new stock hogs and those just re- turned from exhibitions and sales. Do not borrow or lend hogs for breed- ing purposes if cholera is prevailent.

4. Gurn to ashes or bury four feet deep all animals that die on the farm.

5. Immunize herds dangerously near infected centers and give care- ful attention to the feeding and hand- ling of the herd, for mange lice and worms lower the vitality of the hogs and render them susceptible to the disease.

6. If cholera appears in your herd post warning signs so that your neigh bors will know of it.

7. Insist that the temperature of all hogs be taken at the time of treatment and an increased dose of serum given to those showing a tem- erature of 104 degrees F. or over.

8. Don't rely on serum to cure sick hogs—it is primarily a precentative.

9. If the disease has run its course on your farm disinfect thoroly all places where sick hogs have been. Burn all litter, rubbish and old trough Turn over portable houses exposing the interior to sunlight. Thorely clean pens and buildings and disin- fect with compound cresol solution one part to thirty parts of soft wa- ter.

GRAIN GROWERS SCHOOL SPEEDING SOLICITORS

As a result of a school of instruct- ion for solicitors held last week at Eagle Grove under the direction of Adam Middleton, state director, the membership campaign of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., will be extended rapidly in Iowa. Fifty farmers soli- citors attended the school and will be used immediately in solicitations. Work is being carried on this week in Kossuth, Franklin, Buena Vista, Hancock and Story counties. Mr. Middleton expects to have work in progress in ten counties in a short time.

Success in the initial campaign immediately. Last Monday one so- licitor working in Story county se- cured thirteen grower contracts and another turned in nine. A third re- ported seven at the end of the day. Monday evening Mr. Middleton signed up the co-operative elevator at Roland and seven directors accepted the grower contract. Tuesday morning the second elevator at Roland was signed. On one trip, Mr. Middleton signed three elevators, one at Gard- ner and another at Randall, in od- dition to the one at Roland.

Recapitulation of organization in the ten state which field operations are now in progress shows a total of 21,829 members, of which aggre- gate 6,603 are in North Dakota, 6,333 in Illinois, 3,715 are in Nebr- aska and 2,275 in Missouri. It is [illegible] 428 eleva[illegible] signed contracts. The campaign in Minnesota was launched last week when C. H. Gustafson, national presi- dent, made a series of speeches in the grain growing sections of the state The work in Minnesota will be in charge of J. S. Jones, director of organization for the Minnesota Farm Bureau.

J. M. Mehl, assistant to President Gustafson, discussed the merits of the farmers national grain marketing plan at Story City on October 29. The meeting had some aspect of a reunion, Mr. Mehl having lived here for some time several years ago, during which period he was manager of the local co-operative elevator.

HUGE SUM IS SPENT ON HIGHWAYS

The counties of Iowa have spent ap- proximately $10,000,000 in draining, grading, graveling and hard surfac- ing roads this year, according to W. J. Burbank, state treasurer, who made public a financial statement dealing with the motor vehicle fees collected and expended by his office from January 1, 1921, to October 17th.

This report shows that the treas- urer has made ten calls on county treasurers so far for auto fees, the amounts drawn ranging from about $400,000 to approximately $500,000, the limit that can be drawn by law at one time. Three of the sight drafts were drawn in four days. Treasurer Burbank said, because a number of counties sent in their bills at one time.

The treasurer's report shows that he had in the primary road fund on January 1, 1921, $3,870,255, that he had drawn from the counties up to October 17, $1,039,897—a total of $12,343,367.

Of the sum, $10,941,670 has been paid out in warrants for road work, $984,140 has been transferred to other road funds, and the remainder, $417,555, is federal aid money still in the state treasury.

MUST CONSULT THE FARMER

While various other fields of relief of unemployment and business depres- sion have so far had chief conditer- ation in President Harding's unem- ployment conference, President R. A. Pearson of Iowa State College one of its members, believes that there can be no complete remedy for un- satisfactory conditions without deal- ing with the farmers' side of the pro- blem as well.

"It is true that much good will result in getting the construction in- dustry under way again throughout the country as proposed," says Pres- ident Pearson who is in Ames for a short business trip during a recess of the conference. "But it is also vital that agricultural situation be adjusted if there be any permanent improvement.

Not that our farmers will be stand- ing in breadlines unless they get re- lief, but that farmers furnish 40 per cent of the total buying power of the country in normal times, and that great buying power is now paralyzed, because farm products cannot be sold except for disastrously low prices as compared with the prices of the things the farmer has to buy. The farmer feels that he cannot buy and he isn't buying. He is not even supplying the needs of his farm and home. Some industrial plants are closed for no other reason than that the great buy- ing power of farmers is paralyzed and their closing is of course respons- ible for much of the general business and industrial conditions and unem- ployment.

FIND NO TRACE OF MISSING MAN

Chronicle: Arthur C. Towle, a well known young farmer, residing on the W. D. Evans farm, near Geneva, has been missing from his home since last Thursday, and his whereabouts up to this time is a deep mystery to his family and friends.

Mr. Towle was at his home last Thursday afternoon, as he was seen on that place by Arnold F. Snater, a neighbor, who resides across the road from the Towle home. He invited Mr. Towle over to dinner, as the lat- ter's wife and children were at Ackley but he declined the invitation, saying that he was going over to the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Benson Towle, west of Geneva. He also told Mr. Snater that he was going to Ackley that night, as his family had been there for several days, visiting at the home of Dr. H. L. Wright. Mrs. Towle had been there taking treat- ment from Dr. Wright, whose wife is a sister of Mr. Towle. It is stated that his wife had been expecting him down to Ackley that night and when he did not show up for several days she began to wonder why he did not come.

Saturday morning Mr. Snater fail- ed to see anyone about the Towle home and as he also failed to notice Mr. Towle around the place on Friday he went over to investigate. He found the cows had not been milked and no chores done for two days at least. He milked the cows, and later in the day he went over to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Benson Towle and made inquiry concerning their son. The parents believed he must have gone to Ackley, but when told of conditions the home of their son they immediately phoned to the home of Dr. Wright in Ackley, and found that he was not there and had not been there. Inevestigation was at once started, and it was dis- covered that he was in Hampton along about noon on Thursday, stopped at the Iowa Battery Service Station, and told at that place that he was going fishing. He drove a practically new Cleveland automobile and had a gun and fish pole in his car and was dress- ed in his old clothes. At his home it was found that he had not taken any of his other clothes, or anything else of value that can be discovered Where he went or why he went no one seems to know.

He is not the sort of a fellow who would be likley to leave his wife and three children without notice. So far as known he has always been a man of clean habits, and there is no known reason for his sudden disap- pearance. Like several other farmers on leased lands, he probably run be- hind the past couple of years and no doubt is involved in financial diffi- culties, but that is no reason to cause one to skip out and leave his family. Lots of men have their financial troubles, but stick to the ship and come out in a few years with flying colors, with honor to themselves and their families.

Mr. Towle's family fear that he has met with foul play. Others say that he has spent too much time fishing and hunting instead of attending to his work on the farm, and facing financial difficulties he decided to go and leave his troubles for others to untangle.

Don't let criticism worry you. Its absence would indicate your mental inferiority.

"Peace on earth and good will toward men," it reads. But why not toward women?

THT FARMERI'S WIFE

"What Shall We Eat?"

With Thanksgiving turkey gobbling outside of the window, the farmer's wife begins to count the noses of her prospective Thanksgiving guests and to ponder that greatest of questions "what shall we eat?" Nowadays it isn't necessary to load the table with so much food that half of it is left over. A well balanced Thanksgiving meal is better for the digestion of the guests and for the good temper of the cook. Instead of making the guests feel stuffed as the turkey himself, the sensible cook will prepare a few well chosen things and serve them carefully.

Cranberries Of Course

The turkey would be insulted with- out some preparation of cranberries, as would the chicken, duck or what ever fowl happens to be in line for the big day. Here are some hints for fixing up cranberries.

Cranberry Sauce

Pick over and wash three cups cranberries. Put in a stewpan, add one and one-fourth cups of sugar (granulated) one cup boiling water. Boil ten minutes with the pan closely covered. Remove the scum and cool.

This Sauce Is Richer

For those who prefer a richer, sweeter sauce, this recipe is delicious, Use equal measure of berries and sugar. Wash, drain, and put the berries in a porcelain kettle with cold water just enough to show when the berries are pressed down in the pan. When they co[illegible] add a quarter of the sugar. Sprinkle over the berries with- out stirring. Let it boil a minute, add another quarter, etc, until all the sugar is used. Boil up once more and turn out. Boil slowly and do not stir.

Cranberry Jelly.

Pick over and wash four cups of berries. Boil twenty minutes with two cups of boiling water. Rub through a sieve, add two cups granulated sugar and cook five minutes. Turn in- to moulds or glasses.

Candied Cranberry

Make a sirup of two-thirds cup water, and one and one-fourths cup sugar, by boiling them together for five minutes. Then add one pint cran- berries and let them stand for a few [illegible] clear, drain, put on a large pan dusted with granulated sugar sprinkle a little more sugar over them and dry very slowly in a medium oven.

Suggested Centerpieces

For the Thanksgiving table center- piece hollow out a large pumpkin and fill it with fruit, pine cones, or ever- greens. A woodsy touch can be added by placing any kind of leaves around the base of the pumpkin. The pump- kin may be shaped into a basket by leaving space for the handle and hollowing out the rest.

Thanksgiving Dinner Trimmings

Like a hat without trimmings is the Thanksgiving dinner without cer- tain additions which go to make this dinner a complete whole not to be met with every day in the year. This recipe for steamed pudding made with carrts is pronounced unusually tasty and fitting for Thanksgiving desert.

Steamed Pudding with carrots

1 cup carrots, 1 cup potatoes, 1-2 cup melted butter or Crisco, 3-4 cup brown sugar, 1 cup flour, 1 T nutmeg, 1 T cinnamon, 1 T salt. 1 T soda, and 2 cups raisins. Put the potatoes and carrots through a fine grinder twice. Put the mixture together, pour into a buttered mold and steam for 2 1-2 hours.

HARD SAUCE

Delicious to serve with this pudding is hard sauce made by creaming one- third cup butter, adding 1 cup pow- dered sugar, one-third T lemon ex tract and two thirds T vanilla. The sauce may be attractively served by placing it in little mounds around the pudding on a platter. Chopped nut meats or cherries may be dropped on top of the mounds of sauce.

Turkey Dressing (Swedish Style)

Try this dressing for the turkey. 2 cups stale bread crumbs, two-thirds cup melted butter, 1-2 cup raisins, seeded and cut in pieces, 1-2 cup English walnut meats, broken in pieces, salt and pepper and sage to taste. Mix ingredients in the order given.

Prickly Pear Salad

A toothsome salad may be prepared by laying canned pears (cut into halves lengthwise) on head lettuce leaves filling the pears with blanched almonds sliced thinly the long way, and covering with a spoonful of boiled dressing.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—Young Carlyle Wilburton Dale, or "Bill Dale," as he elects to be known, son of a wealthy coal operator, John K. Dale, arrives at the Halfway Switch, in eastern Tennessee, abandoning a life of idle ease—and incidentally a bride, Patricia Clavering, at the altar—determined to make his own way in life. He meets "Babe" Littleford, typical mountaineer girl. "By" Heck, a character of the hills, takes him to John Moreland's home. Moreland is chief of his "clan," which has an old feud with the Littlefords. He tells Dale of the killing of his brother, David Moreland, years ago, owner of rich coal deposits, by a man named Carlyle. Moreland's description of "Carlyle" causes Dale to believe the man was his father.

CHAPTER II.—Dale arranges to make his home with the Moreland family, for whom he entertains a deep respect.

CHAPTER III.—Talking with "Babe" Littleford next day, Dale is ordered by "Black Adam" Ball, bully of the district, to leave "his girl" alone. Dale replies spiritedly, and they fight. Dale whips the bully, though badly used up. He arranges with John Moreland to develop David's coal deposits. Ben Littleford sends a challenge to John Moreland to meet him with his followers next day, in battle. Moreland agrees.

CHAPTER IV.—During the night all the guns belonging to the Littlefords and the Morelands mysteriously disappear.

CHAPTER V.—Dale arranges to go to Cincinnati to secure money for the mining of the coal. The two clans find their weapons, which the women had hidden, and line up for battle. "Babe," in an effort to stop the fighting, crosses to the Moreland side of the river, and is accidentally shot by her father and seriously wounded.

CHAPTER VI.—To get proper surgical aid, John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Dale convey "Babe," unconscious, to the city. Doctors assure them she is not seriously hurt. Dale meets an old friend, Bobby McLaurin, who had married Patricia Clavering. Telling his father of David Moreland's coal, the old gentleman's actions convince his son of his father's guilt in the killing of Moreland.

CHAPTER VII.—It is arranged that "Babe" is to stay with Mrs. McLaurin to be educated. Dale, refusing his father's proffered financial aid to develop the mine, interests Newton Wheatley, capitalist, who agrees to furnish the money. Dale realizes he loves "Babe."

CHAPTER VIII. — Returning to the Halfway Switch, Dale meets Major Bradley, lawyer, and real friend of the mountaineers, whom he engages as counsel for the company. A man named Goff, of evil repute, tries to bribe Dale to betray the Morelands by selling him the coal deposits, and telling them they are of little value. Dale attempts to thrash him, but Goff draws a revolver. Dale is unarmed.

CHAPTER IX.—Goff enlists the aid of a turbulent crowd, the Balls and Torreys, to make trouble for Dale's company. The Littlefords and Morelands agree to forget the old feud and dwell in harmony.

CHAPTER X.—"Babe" returns to her home, fearing she is a burden to the McLaurins. Dale remonstrates, and she agrees to go back, for the sake of an education. Waylaid by "Black Adam" Ball, Dale fights a pistol duel with the desperado, and Ball is killed. Dale is arrested and taken to jail at Cartersville. He doesn't see how his shot could have killed Ball.

CHAPTER XI.—There is much speculation as to who really killed Ball, the general opinion being it was By Heck, who had constituted himself Dale's guardian.

CHAPTER XII. — Caleb Moreland, son of John Moreland, admits firing the shot which killed Ball, and takes Dale's place in jail. He is innocent, but takes the blame for the killing in order that Dale can continue the development of the mine.

CHAPTER XIII.—On the pretext of investigating another coal deposit, Dale is decoyed to a gathering of the Balls and Torreys. They "try" him for the murder of Adam Ball, find him guilty, and sentence him to be hanged next day. He is rescued by By Heck. Goff is forced to leave the neighborhood.

CHAPTER XIV. — "Babe" writes Dale that she is living with his parents and that her education is progressing. Jimmy Fayne, rich and dissolute, asks "Babe" to marry him, but she tells him she loves Dale.

CHAPTER XV.—"Babe" comes to Cartersville to attend Dale's trial. He is acquitted of the murder of Ball. Dale asks "Babe" to marry him. She loves him, but tells him she cannot be his wife.

CHAPTER XVI. — "Babe" tells Mrs. Dale her son had asked her to marry him and that she refused. Pressed for a reason, she confesses she killed Adam Ball to save Dale's life, and that she feels she is not worthy to be his wife.

CHAPTER XVII.—Jimmy Fayne presses his suit. "Babe" finally and definitely refuses him, though he promises that if she will marry him, he will help and educate the Littlefords, the girl's dearest wish.

"'Feller citizens,' says he, 'Eb Wright thar 'lows I don't know the difference atween temp'rary and permanent. I'll prove to you that I do know the difference. Eb Wright says I'm drunk. I am. That's temp'rary. Eb Wright is a poke-nosed idjit. That's permanent!'"

Heck finished with a lazy laugh: "Haw, haw, haw! Hee-haw, hee-haw!"

"That story," Dale said wearily, "has been told on dozens of politicians. It has become a part of the history of this state."

"Well, my gosh!" moaned By Heck. He thought deeply for a moment, decided that Bill Dale wouldn't laugh at the story of Tom Jones' pig—which had drank all of a gallon-pail of buttermilk and then gone to sleep in the self-same pail—and went on:

"Here's one, by Jake, 'at ain't been told on dozens o' politics men. And every word of it is the solemn, dyin' death-bed truth, too.

"One time I was out in the mountains a-huntin', a-goin' along slow and a-lookin' fo' a squirrel, when all of a suddent I hears a skeery noise right ahead o' me in the laurels—Z-z-z-z-z!

Z-z-z-z-z! Jest like that. I stops. I stops de-e-ad still. I looks keen. Thar was a den o' rattlers, and the very least one was as big around as my left hind laig! Then I hears a turrible growl right ahind o' me. I looks keen. Thar stands a big old she-bear with her teeth a-showin', and two cross-eyed cubs! Then I hears a whine at my left. I looks keen. Thar stands a she-panther as big as a hoss, with her eyes jest a-blazin'! Then I hears a spittin' sound out to my right. I looks keen. Thar was seven full-grown wildcats, and all of 'em had been bit by a mad dawg! Some fix to be in? Yeuh; some fix!

"Well, I thinks to myself. Ef I shoots the rattlers, I thinks to myself, the bear and the panther and the wildcats'll git me. And ef I shoots the bear, the panther and the wildcats and the rattlers'll git me. And ef I shoots the panther, the wildcats and the rattlers and the bear'll git me. And ef I shoots the wildcats, the rattlers and the bear and the panther'll git me. And ef I don't shoot none of 'em, they'll all git me! Some ongodly fix wasn't it, Bill? Now, how do ye reckon I got out of it?"

Bill Dale only smiled. "I can't imagine, By," he said.

"I cain't imagine, neither," grinned Heck. "But anyhow, I'm alive today. Well, now that ye're in a good humor one time more, I'll tell ye some news. I hated to ruffle ye up like a yaller goose a-flyin' back'ards whilst ye was so cussed, danged blue. Bill, old boy, it ain't but five days ontel Christmas. A lot o' them Nawth Ca'liner Turners from Turner's Laurel is a-visitin' their kinfolks, the Balls, and they'll every dadslatted one of 'em git drunk on white lightnin' licker fo' Christmas, and—they'll shore think o' Black Adam. The Morelands ain't with ye no more, Bill, rickollect; only the Littlefords is here now."

Bill Dale rose and stood there staring at By Heck with eyes so bright that they sparkled.

"If they came down on us looking for trouble, I'd be a sort of clan chief, wouldn't I?" he asked. Without waiting for an answer: "I wouldn't mind that, y'know. I've got a letter here, By, that I want you to put aboard the next southbound train that passes the Halfway switch. You've got about an hour; can you make it?"

"Ef the world was made in six days, by God, it shorely looks like By Heck could make six miles in a hour, don't it?"

The tall hillman left the Moreland Coal company's office with the letter in one hand, his rifle in the other, and tears of joy in his eyes.

For Bill Dale had laughed, actually laughed.

* * * * * * *

By Heck put the letter on the train. The train carried it to Bill Dale's home city, and the postman carried it to the stately mansion of Old Coal King John K. Dale, and black Isham, the servant, carried it to Miss Elizabeth Littleford.

Miss Elizabeth Littleford was sitting alone on an iron settee among bushes of lilac and cape jessamine; the weather had made another of its remarkably sudden changes, and the day was sunny and pleasant. She was about to tear open the envelope when the tall, straight figure of Jimmy Fayne appeared before her. He had on riding clothes, and there was a rawhide quirt in his hand.

"You scared me, Jimmy!" laughed Miss Elizabeth, a trifle nervously. "I didn't know you were anywhere around!"

"Beg pardon," Jimmy smiled. "May I sit down beside you?"

"Yes."

He sat down beside her and began thoughtfully to flick the toe of one of his shining boots with the tip of his quirt. She knew what he had come to say, before he said it:

"Once more," looking pleadingly into her eyes—"won't you marry me and make me happy forever afterward?"

She turned the letter over in her lap in order that Fayne might not see, accidentally or otherwise, the address.

"Jimmy," she finally said, "I'd like to have a little more time to think about it. Things like this oughtn't to be decided in a hurry."

"You've already had months! Or were they years—or ages? Why do you keep putting me off like this, Elizabeth?"

"As I told you, Jimmy, I don't—"

He interrupted almost sharply: "I know you don't love me. But you'll learn to—after you've seen how much I shall adore you."

He made a move as though to take her into his arms, and she shrank from him; he had done that same thing, and she had done that same thing, dozens of times before. . . . With unseeing eyes Elizabeth watched Mrs. Dale step from her motor at the porte-cochere and go into the house. Jimmy Fayne, too, saw Mrs. Dale, but he was wholly unaffected by the sight of her; Mrs. Dale, somehow, did not object to his seeing the girl quite as much as she had once objected.

"Jimmy," after a long silence had passed between them, "I—I'm afraid I ain't the right woman for you. . . . If you knew, for sure, that I once took a rifle gun and killed a man with it, would you—would you still want me?"

Fayne laughed as though at a good joke.

"You kill a man? Why, I couldn't believe it. But if you had killed a man, or a dozen men, it—it could hardly make any difference to me. If you did do it, you did it because there was nothing else to do; I'm sure of that. We won't mention it again, if you're willing. I neither criticize nor attempt to understand your hill codes. Marry me, won't you, Elizabeth?"

"If I did," asked Ben Littleford's daughter, "would you help my people back in the hills?"

"Educate 'em? Yes! Every blessed one of 'em."

"Freely?"

"Yes!"

Once more Elizabeth Littleford tried to decide. Fayne's eyes grew more and more hopeful as he watched her lips. He became impatient.

"Tell me," he begged.

The girl took up the letter she had just received from Bill Dale.

"As soon as I read this," she murmured, "I'll tell you, Jimmy. If you don't mind, please look the other way for a minute."

She tore off one end of the envelope, drew out the single sheet and unfolded it. Her eyes narrowed; her face flushed, and then became just a little pale. Her underlip quivered as she folded the sheet and put it back into the envelope.

"I can't marry you, Jimmy," she told him.

Without another word she arose and left him. She hastened to the house, hastened upstairs, and went to her room.

Half an hour later Mrs. Dale found her lying face downward on her bed, and beside her lay a crumpled sheet of paper. Mrs. Dale picked up the sheet, straightened it out, and read this, in the bold handwriting of her son:

"Believe me, I am very appreciative of your invitation. But I am having Christmas with your mother, here in my own country."

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Last Fight.

It was early in the morning, and Bill Dale had just sent for Ben Littleford. The hillman hurried to the office, for he believed he knew what was in the air. He had already gone to work at the mine, and his thick beard, his face and his hands were black with the dust of coal.

"Sit down, Ben," said the general manager. "We're going to hold a council of war."

Littleford took a chair and crossed his legs.

"Is it the Ball outfit?" he drawled.

"Yes," answered the younger man, and forthwith he told the other of the news that By Heck had brought him a few days before; he had not given the matter really serious consideration until that morning. "Now," he finished, "I want to know whether you think there's any danger?"

Littleford tugged at his blackened beard and frowned.

"Bill," he said soberly, "do you rickollect what John Moreland told you oncet about them Balls? He told ye 'at you wasn't safe, and 'at he wasn't safe, ontel they was dead and buried, didn't he? I believe he did. By Heck says the's a whole big passel o' them Nawth Ca'liner Turners; he's shore them and the Balls'll outnumber us more'n two to one. Yes, the's danger, Bill, and 'specially to you. They think it was you killed Adam, and they don't think the law handed 'em a square deal at the trial."

"Then listen to this plan," said Dale.

"I'll keep By Heck up the river watching for them. He will have three sticks of dynamite tied together and capped and fitted with a fuse. If he sees them coming this way in anything like a force, he will fire off the dynamite as a signal to us. Our men will gather here in the upstairs of this building, and bar the doors—"

"Oh, Bill," moaned the old fighter, "you shorely don't think we'd ever let 'em git to the doors!"

"I hope they don't, certainly," smiled Dale. "Where are your rifles, Bill?"

"At the mine," said Littleford. "Ye see, Bill, we've been a-lookin' fo' trouble."

Dale went on: "At By Heck's signal, I'll get on my horse and ride to the lowlands for the Morelands. I can get them a lot quicker than I can get competent help from the law. What do you think of it?"

"It's a good plan, I reckon," growled Ben Littleford, "only I don't cotton very easy to the idee o' us a-runnin' from the mine to this here buildin'. I never did like to run from any man wo'th a durn, Bill."

"But that wouldn't be cowardly," Dale protested. "It would be purely a strategic move, and it would save lives for us. For, when the Balls and their kinsmen come, you'll have to deliver me into their hands or you'll have to fight like the very devil, that's sure; and, according to By Heck's figures, they outnumber you more than two to one."

"All right," Littleford replied, with a shrug of his huge shoulders. "Whatever you say, that same we'll do."

So By Heck was sent for, and shortly afterward he sneaked into the laurels and went off toward the settlement of the Balls. In the crook of his arm he carried his rifle, and inside his shirt he carried three pieces of dynamite all ready for the match—and he chose every step with great care for fear of jarring the explosive too much.

He had not been gone an hour when Bill Dale heard a dull, smothered roar from somewhere to the northward. Dale sprang up from his desk, ran to his ready and waiting horse, mounted and rode like a streak toward the lowland.

Dale arrived at John Moreland's big white farmhouse a little before the middle of the day, and halloed lustily at the gate. John Moreland and his two sons hurried out in response to the call. Dale waved aside all greetings and inquiries after his health, and told that which he had come to tell. The elder Moreland turned quickly to his two stalwart sons—

"Guns and hosses, boys! It'll be our last fight, and le's be at it and make it a good fight."

Less than five minutes later the three erstwhile mountaineers rode out at the barnyard gate with full belts of cartridges around their waists and with repeating rifles across the pommels of their saddles, and joined Dale. The four hastened to the homes of the other Morelands; and not long afterward the old clan, in full strength, rode toward the big, dim-blue hills with Bill Dale acting as its leader. It was to be the clan's last fight, and a fight for a good cause, and every man of it was eager for the fray. . . .

Bill Dale bore himself proudly, and he rode like a man born to the saddle. He found a queer joy—a joy that brightened his steel-grey eyes and flushed his sunburned cheeks, a joy that he didn't even attempt to understand—in the thought:

"For this one day I am a clan chief; I am leading my own people against a foe, in my own country—"

And so overwhelmingly did the idea take hold of him that he wished, even then, for the repeater that awaited him at his office back in the heart of the mountains. Once his conscience asked him a question—and he answered it with another question. Was he doing that which was right? Might not the Littlefords all be killed by those drunken cutthroats while he was waiting for the arrival of a company of militia from a city miles distant?

Anyway, the militia would fight. His clan would do no more than that. He satisfied his conscience quickly.

When they had reached the lower end of the cleared valley, there came to them the sounds of slow firing, the firing of snipers. Each man kicked his horse's flanks and rode faster.

When they came in sight of the besieged building, they saw puffs of powder-smoke rising lazily from the upper windows and from the mountain side above and to the right. Again they kicked the flanks of their horses and rode faster.

At John Moreland's old cabin they dismounted hastily and turned their horses into the drab meadow. With Dale still leading, they hurried on foot to the river's nearest bank and went rapidly, under cover of the thickly-standing sycamores, to a point within seventy yards of the office and supplies building. Then they made a dash across the open space, and Ben Littleford, with one arm bound up in a red-stained blue bandana, opened the door for them.

"Who else is hurt?" panted Dale.

"Little Tom," answered Littleford, "and Saul. Little Tom, he got a bullet onder the shoulder. Saul, he got one in might' nigh the same place. They've riddled the whole t'other side o' the house to splinters. They're a-callin' fo' you."

"They'll get all they want of me," Dale growled.

He turned and ran up the rough stairway, and Ben Littleford and the Morelands followed close upon his heels. At the front and side windows, behind anything they had been able to find that would stop a bullet, knelt Littlefords with rifles in their hands, patiently watching for a human target to appear on the mountainside above. Saul and Little Tom lay in a corner, where they were fairly safe from chance bullets. Hayes had bound up their wounds as well as he could with the material at hand. They were both white and helpless and suffering, but still full of the old Littleford fighting spirit.

Dale seized his Winchester and belt of cartridges from the hands of the man who had brought them to him, and turned to the others. A bullet crashed through the wall and struck the floor at his foot; he paid no attention to it.

"Listen to me, boys." Dale was buckling his cartridge-belt with rapid, steady fingers. "From where they are hiding, the Balls and Turners can hardly see the lower story of this building. We'll go downstairs, open the front door, and run to the edge of the laurels at the foot of the mountain. Then we'll turn to the right, make a wide detour, and get above the Ball outfit; we'll be fighting downhill instead of uphill. Get me? Are you all ready?"

To a man, they were ready.

They reached the thick undergrowth without being seen by the enemy. While the Balls and Turners fired more or less aimlessly at the building, drank white whisky and called drunkenly for the surrender to them of Bill Dale. Bill Dale and his men were making their way steadily in a wide half-circle up the side of David Moreland's mountain.

Half an hour after they had left the office building, Dale had stationed his men, deployed as a line of skirmishers, behind sheltering trees some two hundred feet above the Balls and their kinsmen.

John Moreland, Ben Littleford and Bill Dale were not far apart. "It's a shame to do it," said Dale. "I swear, we can't shoot men in the back like this!"

John Moreland, twisted his mouth into a queer smile of contempt, and so did Ben Littleford. They knew, far better than their leader, the ways of that people without a principle. The Balls and Turners wouldn't hesitate to shoot them in the back!

"Well," John Moreland replied, and it was almost a sneer, "ye might go down thar and give 'em some candy, and kiss 'em, and ax 'em won't they please surrender!"

Dale leaned around his tree, a great gnarled chestnut, and called boldly:

"You've got a chance to surrender now—and you'd certainly better take it quick!"

One of those below yelled surprisedly: "Who're you?" Then they all whipped to the other side of their sheltering timber.

The answer came at once: "I'm Bill Dale, and I'm peeved! You're at the mercy of the finest hill clan that ever looked along rifle barrels; will you surrender, or fight it out?"

"You said it—we'll fight it out!" cried a burly cousin of Black Adam Ball, deceased.

"You're on!" growled Bill Dale, slipping his rifle out beside the tree. "Give 'em h—l, boys!"

He was unused to this sort of thing, and he was incautious. He showed a little too much of himself—there was a sudden keen report from below, and a bullet hole appeared in the rim of his hat! John Moreland fired the next shot, and he broke the right arm of the man who had just fired at Bill Dale. This opened the battle in earnest.

Soon the thunder of the many rifles became almost a steady roar. The air was filled with the pungent odor of burning powder. Bill Dale emptied the magazine of his repeater, and sank behind the big chestnut to fill it again with cartridges from his belt. Bullets now whined on both sides of him; they cut greenish white furrows in the bark of both sides of the tree, and knocked up little spurts of black earth to his right and to his left; they cut off twigs within an arm's reach of him. A dozen Balls were now firing at him, seeking to avenge the death of their kinsman, the Goliath. John Moreland's strong voice came to him through the din and roar:

"Don't show no part o' yoreself now, Bill; ef ye do, ye'll shore be hit!"

Dale fired again, pumped a fresh cartridge into the chamber of his rifle and slipped another into the magazine, and arose behind the chestnut.

"Down, Bill!" cried John Moreland.

If Dale heard, he gave no sign of it. He fired four shots rapidly, and before the wind had carried away the blinding smoke he was behind another tree and shooting toward the Balls again. Soon there came a short, loud peal of laughter from his left; he turned his head and saw Ben Littleford taking a careful aim at a long angle toward the side of a boulder. Then Littleford fired, and a puff of stone dust showed that his bullet had gone true to its mark.

"What's that for?" demanded Dale. "We haven't any ammunition to throw away!"

"Why, Bill," replied Littleford, "didn't ye never bounce a bullet offen a rock and make it go toward a man ahind of a tree?"

It lasted hotly for two hours, but the casualties were comparatively few, because there was so much cover available. From the beginning the Balls and the Turners had the worst of it, which was due to uphill shooting, white whisky, and lack of the iron that makes real fighting men. The cartridges of those below were giving out; they had fired too many shots needlessly.

"It's about time to rush them," Dale said to John Moreland, who had crept up beside him.

"Jest give the word," Moreland nodded.

A few minutes later, Bill Dale sent the wings of his line down the mountainside, forming a half-circle of his force once more; then the whole line rushed, surrounded the enemy and called for a surrender.

But the Balls and their kinsmen wouldn't give in yet. They left their cover and started to run, found themselves facing Morelands and Littlefords in every direction, clubbed their rifles and fought. It was not true courage that prompted them to offer resistance thus: it was utter desperation; they had never been givers of mercy, therefore they did not expect mercy. Dale's men forebore to fire upon them, which was at Dale's command, and met them with clubbed rifles. The woodland rang with the sound of wood and steel crashing against wood and steel. Everywhere there were groans and threats and curses from the losing side, victorious cries and further demands for a surrender from the winners.

Bill Dale, ever a lover of fair combat, threw down his repeater to grapple with a big North Carolinian whose clubbed weapon had been knocked from his hands. The two fell and rolled down the mountainside, locked in each other's arms.

And then one of the Balls struck Bill Dale across the head with the butt of his empty gun, and Bill Dale slackened his arms and lay as one dead.

* * * * * * *

He was lying under cover in a hand-carved black walnut fourposter, and it was night, when he opened his eyes again. Above him he saw the bearded faces of Ben Littleford and John Moreland, and they looked haggard and anxious in the oil lamp's yellow light. Suddenly Moreland spoke:

"Dead—nothin'!" jubilantly. "Look, Ben; he's done come to! Ye couldn't put him in a cannon and shoot him ag'inst a clift and kill him, Ben! I hope ye're a-feelin' all right, Bill, shore."

Dale realized everything quite clearly. He put a hand to his head; there was a wet cloth lying over the swollen place.

"He shore give ye a buster of a lick," drawled a voice that Dale instantly recognized as that of his worshiper, By Heck. "Danged ef Cale Moreland didn't might' nigh it beat him to death, Bill!"

Many men crowded to the bedside and smiled at him, and he smiled back at them. Soon he asked:

"Did you capture the outfit?"

"Every durned one of 'em," answered John Moreland. "They're all shet up tight in the downstairs o' the office buildin', onder gyard. The' ain't but one of 'em plumb teetotally dead, fo' a wonder; but the's a whole passel of 'em hurt. I've done sent Luke to town on hossback, atter a doctor fo' you and Saul and Little Tom; and he can 'tend to them crippled Balls, too, I reckon, ef you think it's best. What're we a-goin' to do with them fellers, Bill?"

"We're going to take them to the Cartersville jail," Dale answered promptly.

"I had a different plan 'an that planned out, John," said By Heck, winking at Ben Littleford. "I had it planned out to hang 'em all on a big green hemlock as a Christmas tree fo' Bill! Some devilish rough Christmas eve ye're a-havin', Bill, old boy, ain't it?"

"Rather," smiled Dale. He closed his eyes. His head ached, and he was somehow very tired.

Within the hour he went to sleep, and when he awoke it was daylight on Christmas morning. Ben Littleford, half dressed, was stirring the coals to life in the wide-mouthed stone fireplace. Dale felt better than he had expected to feel; he greeted Littleford with the compliments of the season, arose and dressed himself.

COURT HOUSE NEWS

(From the Monitor.)

The November term of the district court for Wright county convenes at Clarion on the 28th with Judge Fry of Boone presiding.

Thursday is the last day for filing cases for trial at this term. Present indication are that not more than 25 or 30 new cases will be filed and that the term will be a rather quiet one.

Following is a resume of the more important cases now filed:

Only two divorce cases are scheduled for this term: The first is that of Annie Severson vs. John Severson. The wife alleges desertion of herself and children and believes defendant enlisted as a private in the U. S. army and that he is now serving therein.

The second case comes from Belmond and the wife is accused of being cruel and inhuman to the husband. He also alleges statutory charges. Buchanan is the title of the case. Among other things the young husband alleges his young wife stays out late at night, calls him vile names refuses to prepare hism eals and has unlawful relations with other men.

The Farmers Elevator at Olaf has begun suit against James Hatt and wife to recover $274.23 on account. S. O. Windecker an Olaf merchant is suing the same parties for goods sold them to the value of $226.04. Hatt has taken advantage of the bankruptcy law.

Rube McFerren of Webster City is made defendant in two suits brought by Belmond parties to compel him to carry out certain land contracts for the purchase of real estate. James Kenefick asks the foreclosure of a certain mortgage to secure payment of a $15,000 note signed by defendant and his wife. Interest and cost also amount to $753.

John Dorenkamp holds a note f the same amount, with costs amounting to $600.

Malaise and Mourlam of Woolstock hold a note given by Geo. Wheeler et al on which there is now due the sum of $4992. The Wheeler store is now in the hands of his creditors.

P. A. Smith of Eagle Grove is made defendant in a suit to recover the sum of $676 on his promissory note given to the Citizens National bank of Cheyenne, Wyo.

Another suit growing out of a land deal is that of Ole Thompson vs. Geo. Cook who seeks the foreclosure of a mortgage to recover on a note for $28,500. Interest, costs and taxes amount to several hundred dollars additional.

Alfred Swenson of Belmond, a partner in a garage known as "Motor Inn," is made defendant in a suit brought by Seig. Co. for merchandise.

A note for $1026 executed by G. H. Jameson of Dows is being sued upon by the present owner J. R. Paul. The note was given originally to the Merchants National bank of Jefferson.

Photographer Cook took the pictures of the six men and one woman now confined in the county jail. A new law makes such a step necessary. We are not informed as to whether or not they all responded to the usual "look pleasant" admonition.

Marshall Reynolds of Eagle Grove brought a one armed man to Clarion Monday to serve a sentence in the county jail for bootlegging.

News: What few suits are being filed in district court at this time are for account or to recover on past due notes, and even these are few and far between when the filings for the past term of court are considered.

S. B. Hefty & Son file suit against R. W. Frank and wife to collect on a note for $1500, the amount now due totaling $1,64933. Interest and costs are also asked.

Schoonover & Zeh are suing the Rose motor Co. to collect on a note for $328.07 plus interest and costs.

Reid Carpenter and R. G. Ross are suing R. W. Frank to recover on a note for $2,800, made April 1, 1921, due in 90 days, which remains unpaid, in part the balance due totaling $2,076 which sum they ask the court to award them plus interest and costs.

John Dorenkamp is suing Rube McFerren and wife to collect on a $15,000 note, protected by a mortgage in a certain real estate sold the McFerrens and described as the se quarter of section 27 and the nw quarter of the ne quarter and the ne quarter of the ne quarter of section 34. Jas. Kenefick, C. C. Griesy, and the Belmond Lumber Co. are made defendants in the suit as the above claim some right to the land. Judgement for the amount due, plus interest and costs and $350.66 delinquent taxes, and a foreclosure of the mortgage, is asked by the plaintiff.

PRESIDENT HARDING URGES RED CROSS SUPPORT

and international relief in time of peace and to apply the same in mitigating the suffering caused by pestilence, famine, fire, floods, and other national calamities."

After liquidating its obligations of general relief to peoples of other lands who were associated with us in the great war, it has concentrated its foreign efforts on a program for the medical relief of children in Central Europe, and, from funds made available last year, it continues this work of mercy, and also contributes from its medical and hospital supplies for the work of relief in Russia which is operated under American directions.

As a result of vast and various experiences during the World War, the American Red Cross has devised and put in operation an extensive domestic health and welfare program whereby our American communities are instructed and directed in the solution of these community problems upon which the public will ultimately rests.

It is a fundamental principle of the Red Cross not to duplicate but to supplement the efforts of governmental and other agencies in the mitigation and elleviation of human suffering, and not to supply the means thereto where other agencies do not exist. The call of the American Red Cross is the call of country and humanity, and I earnestly urge my fellow citizens to make that response which satisfies the promptings of a generous people.

Long Living.

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund, well-fed, but thin, spare men, who live on a slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionally eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, causing indigestion or constipation and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Tablets to move his bowels and invigorate his stomach. When this is done, there is no reason why the average man should not live to a ripe old age.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy.

No Subsitute Offered.

Say what you will about druggists offering something "just as good" because it pays a better profit, the fact still stands that ninety-nine out of a hundred druggists recommend Chamberlain's Colic and Diarrhoea Remedy, when the best medicine for diarrhoea is asked for, and do so because they know from what their customers say of it, that it can be depended upon.—For sale by Adams Pharmacy. --

WRIGHT COUNTY RED CROSS DOING SPLENDID WORK

Health has usually been taken for granted in America. There has been progress in curing disease but neglect in promoting health. Certain events of the past few years, have aroused our nation from its complacent attitude and stirred the people to action.

One-third of our young men were rejected from the army for physical unfitness and investigations have shown that at least one-half of all our school children have physical handicaps which retard their development, while one-third of them were found to be definitely undernourshed. The program of the children's year with 6,000,000 children weighed and measured, also proved to the whole country that there are standards of growth and development to which a child should measure up and that underweight and physical handicaps were to be found among the rich as the poor. It is clear then that the program must be one of education, not philanthropy.

At the close of the war a peace program was outlined by the American Red Cross and definite activities were adopted by the various Red Cross chapters that were considered best suited to the needs of the community. The public health nurse was found to fill a need in every sort of community and the amount of good she has accomplished cannot be measured.

The different chapters in Wright county united in the launching of the nursing service in this county and during the first year every school, both rural and town, was visited by Miss Liddle. The value of this service to the county was such that last July the supervisors took over the salary of Miss Liddle and appropriated $1,000 for a second nurse, the Red Cross to furnish the balance of the second nurse's salary and to carry all other expenses. The second nurse Miss Blanche Eddy, began her duties the middle of September, and today the two nurses, each with a Ced Cross marked plainly on her car, are on duty throughout the county.

During the month of October the nurses inspected 715 children, 431 of whom were found with some physical defect and 300 were found to be seven per cent or more under weight. Surely no other statistics are necessary to arouse the parents of Wright county to the necessity of the united effort for the welfare of our children, says the Monitor.

Among the other things accomplished ten children have been sent to Iowa City under the Perkins law for operations and other treatments. Two patients have been sent to Oakdale tuberculosis sanitarium. A county tuberculosis clinic was held at the court house, Dr. Peck of Des Moines examined forty-two persons, among them five active cases of tuberculosis were found and other defects pointed out and recommendations made to thirty-two others.

Twenty-eight schools throughout the county have been reported as serving hot lunches.

All the town schools of the county have purchased scales. The teachers weigh and measure the children regularly every six weeks and reports are sent home to the parents.

Talks have been given to class rooms, teachers institutes, clubs, farm bureau meetings, and various other groups.

Over 700 home calls have been made for the purpose of advising expectant mothers in the care of infants, tuberculosis nursing, mental hygiene nursing, and general advice regarding defects discovered through the school inspections.

The Red Cross has only one way of raising money for its share of the expense for the public health nursing service in Wright county—that is the annual roll call. For that reason every one is urged to renew his Red Cross membership during the coming week. Pay your dollar at either of the banks.

Fred Boyd was up at the head of the lake early one morning about ten days ago when he noticed two men sitting on an upturned boat. These men were hunters. Both had stood up in the boat to shoot some game and in some manner the boat tipped over. They clung to the boat and finally both succeeded in getting upon the bottom of the boat, and there they sat, cold, wet, awaiting rescue. When Fred arrived with his boat they were taken to a nearby house where dry clothing was provided. The men were both so chilled that they could hardly talk and had help not reached them when it did they would no doubt have been lost.—Reporter.

Mrs. Ida Fyler, who has been a guest at the home of her son, Prof. Fyler the past week, returned to her home at Shellrock the first of the week.

Victor Hiserodt of Livermore was driving home from Hardy last week when his car went into the ditch and overturned, and he was pinned under it in such a manner that his arm was broken and he was unable to help himself. The accident happened about eight o'clock in the evening and the young man lay under the auto until the next morning at daylight. He was on an unused road. The gasolene from the car dripped on him all night and he suffered from the cold. He tried to dig himself free with his free arm and his knife but could not accomplish it. He is in a serious condition from the exposure and injury, but it is stated that he will recover.—Humboldt Republican.

Queer what some folks think that an editor ought to know. Last week some one called up and asked us how far it was to the poor farm in the county of Hamilton. We told them that we knew the distance to the one in Wright, but we didn't pay much attention to those in other counties.

A community sing, led by O. L. Varland, started the meeting off in the proper spirit, and following the address by Mr. Blythe, the refreshment committee finished the evening as it should be.

A business meeting of the members was held early in the evening, at which time the committee appointed two weeks ago, rendered a report on reorganization. The following officers and committees were elected:

BAILEY'S VIEW OF FOOT BALL

Terrific Battle Ends 5 To 5 In Favor Of Both Pushes.

"Bailey, of Britt," now deceased, witnessed a football game between Garner and Britt twenty years ago Thanksgiving, and this is the way the game looked to him:

"The Garner football team met Britt on Thanksgiving Day. Both sides blew up their muscle and prepared for death. The first half jumped on the hind half of the second half and all stood on their heads in the last half. This delighted the upper half of the outside half. Then our fullback tackled their partially fullback, catching him by the small of the back, pushing him to the right back. Their halfback then reached up his fullback and grabbed our hunchback by his halfback and hustled him over the line back. This created immense applause, as our coach back caught the ball back when it bounced back over the fullback. Things began to get warm, and it was a question for a few minutes whether the courthouse would remain at Concord or be moved into the vacant lots in front of the Tribune office. Jud Hammill was sweating in every pore, the north wind whistled and everyone yelled to get warm. Their center rush now tackled our side rush, and everybody went down in a ball rush except one, who stood on top of the whole rush and waved his cap. Great applause and clapping of hands by those who didn't have mittens. The north end then caught the west end by the hind end and keeled it over the front end, and left the center end hopelessly tangled up in the bottom end of the last end. The right push then made a ramjam at the wrong push. The center push tried to dodge the main push, but a big push took the little push over the Garner push and that wound up the whole push. Score 5 to 5 in favor of both pushes. The fullback and the halfback came back but no one wanted his quarter back. There were line smashes and punts in their proper places, and several terrific end plays. Those who made them now stand up to eat. Everything went off according to rule, and everybody wild with enthusiasm. If there is any one thing that we would like better on Thanksgiving than

VISIT TO ROME, ETERNAL CITY

Independent Correspondent In Visit To Ancient Cities Of The Old World.

By G. W. Shockley—No. 36

"And this is Rome, the city of the Caesars, the home of the popes, the once proud mistress of the world, the center of all that is most glorious, most remarkable in human history, all that is most enduring in art, all that is most memorable and inspiring in the lives of men. Rome, the land which Scipio covered with imperishable renown and in which he is buried; which gave birth to the Gracchi, and still breathes and burns with Cicero. Here we have another climate, another sky, another world whose historical perspective almost takes one's breath away."—Egbert.

It is a five-hour trip from Naples to Rome by train and it is over a country that is intensely cultivated and a regular garden, so to speak. It is hard for an American to realize an intense cultivation, for we have such a big territory to cultivate, we don't have to. When we double our population, however, we will be compelled to cultivate more closely.

All my life I had heard the expression, "Rome was not built in a day," and I decided after viewing the city, this was literally true and no room for an argument. It is a wonderful city, with much to see and admire and volumes could be written about it. It would only be expected, then, that I would barely skim the surface in a newspaper article, especially as the tale has been so often told in books, as well as visited.

We remember, also, another quotation, which we have heard all our lifetime, and which aspiring Sophomores used in orations, something about Hadrian finding it a city of brick, or something of that sort, and leaving it a city of marble. We can't remember the exact quotation, but anyway, some one did leave it that way.

Many streets in Rome are narrow and crooked, much like our alleys, and are paved, many of them with small squares of stone, that makes walking not always an unalloyed pleasure, notwithstanding the many interesting sights along the way. We doubt if the sun ever falls on some of these places, in fact has no chance to do so.

In this city, also, the Mussolini government has worked great changes, so travelers tell us, for the city has been given a thorough going over and the streets cleaned up, much rubbish being removed. Some way these ancients had a habit, in building cities, to conserve space by making their streets very narrow, thus not permitting the sun to get in its work and drying up the unsightly mud and dirt, so it could be more easily removed. Besides this the chill winds thus seem even the more penetrating without the warmth of the sun's rays.

We were not annoyed so much by beggars in Rome and the urge to come in and trade with us was not nearly so strong. Our crowd was on the last leg of its journey, however, with Monte Carlo, Paris and need of conservation of finances may have made a difference as to an incentive to buy.

However, we presume we were just like most other travelers, after making a very hurried visit felt we'd like to go back to Rome and stay several months and look the city over at our leisure, for we felt sure the time could be most interestingly spent, with new sights each day. Why don't we? How embarrassing. Yes, you guessed it the first time. Someone must have told you—financial.

As we come into Rome on the train an ancient acqueduct comes into view. This was constructed by the Emperor Claudius in the year A. D. 52, and was forty-six miles long. For thirty-six miles it was subterraneous and then for ten miles it was carried on arches, high enough to take the water to the Palatine Hill, for the places of the emperors thus obtained their water supply. There are three others of these ancient acqueducts, which were repaired to furnish water for the city. Rome has a good water supply.

Another high-sounding sentence for an oration we all have heard, "Rome on her seven hills." The hills are still there just as the budding orator always proclaimed—Mons Capitolinus, Mons Palatinus, Mons Quirinalis, Mons Viminalis, Mons Esquilinus, Mons Caelius, and the Mons Aventinus, Mons meaning Hill. All these hills have played a part in Rome's history, but more especially the Palatine Hill, for here were laid the first foundation stones, and you must remember Rome is a very ancient city, having been founded about the eighth century B. C., nearly 3,000 years ago, (753 B. C., to be accurate). At that these famous hills are not so much, so far as hills go when it comes to size. Naturally before reaching Rome, having read so much about the seven hills" you expect to see the city, or part of it, at least, perched away up yonder toward the sky line, but when you get there, you almost wonder where the hills are, as they do not loom up largely. The Quirinal is the highest, 206 feet, the Aventine the lowest, 150 feet, the other five coming in between these two figurs. Naturally there has been quite a little leveling off, and filling in, so that originally the hills were higher, but not much.

The Esquiline Hill is where "Nero fiddled while Rome burned," and here is where his golden palace was located, the baths of Titus being afterward erected on a part of the site of this palace. This fiddling is said to have been done from a tower of the villa of Macenas and Horace was also frequently entertained at this villa. Vergil lived on this same hill, near the gardens of Macenas.

One of the very gripping things about Rome is the fact that at every turn, almost, you are reminded of many of the most note dmen of history, some of them, like Nero, to be execrated. Just as in Palestine, almost every step you take has been trodden by the characters of the Old and New Testament, thus rendering the very soil sacred.

The "Yellow Tiber," whose "tawny flood" Imperial Caesar swam, rising in the Appennines, is here, also, and as we write we have a large map of the city spread out before us. This river flows through the city about in the shape of the

BELIEVE ROBBERS AIMED TO CRACK LATIMER BANK

What is believed was an attempt to rob the Latimer bank was made Tuesday night of this week, but for some unknown reason the supposed burglars did not complete the job.

Wednesday morning the Belmond Telephone company, which owns the Latimer exchange, discovered that connection with the Latimer office was cut off. Hampton called and reported that they could not reach Latimer either. Rural lines were unable to get the Latimer central. T. A. Davenport, manager of the Belmond Telephone Co., instructed the Sheffield trouble shooter to go to Latimer and locate the trouble. It was found that that all the "cans" a Latimer, which contain the trunk lines of the system, had been cut except one, and there was no connection from outside with the town. It is the belief that robbers had spotted the State bank of Latimer for a haul, but for some reason had left the job uncompleted. The wires were cut sometime between midnight and morning, as a toll call was successfully completed from the Latimer office about midnight, Tuesday.

Repair men from the Belmond company were busy yesterday getting the Latimer people connected up again.

Colo Wins By Easy Score

The foot ball team journeyed down to Colo, a small town near Ames, on Friday. The Colo team may be little, but oh, my! At any rate, they won the game, 77 to 0. Colo, however, has one of the crack teams of the state, and has been playing the teams from the larger cities of the state.

BOOZE--AUTO--EIGHT INJURED

Local Man Finds That Gasolene And Booze Will Not Mix.

E. J. Eagon, a young man working near Belmond in the corn fields, was the chief figure in an auto accident on the Clear Lake-Mason City road Sunday night, when eight persons were injured.

Eagan borrowed a Ford touring car Sunday afternoon, acquired a quantity of booze—which he claims to have secured in Belmond—and with a young man friend went to Mason City where they startled celebrating. While driving the car, in an intoxicated conditon, Eagan smashed into a Chevrolet touring car in which were Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Marshall and Otto Dahl, of Mason City, and three other ladies from there. Dahl was driving the Marshall car, which was shoved into the ditch.

Mrs. Marshall suffered quite severe injuries, and seven others in the two cars were more or less injured. Eagan was but slightly hurt, his companion, Henry Epsom, being reported seriously injured. Passers-by rendered first aid, and after ascertaining Eagan's injuries were not serious he was taken to the police station. He claimed not to know anything about the accident, how it occured or where, when questioned the next morning.

What action will be taken in the case is not known at this writing.

Webster County Patrolling Roads

Webster county has purchased a high speed motorcycle, guaranteed to go fast enough to catch the fastest motorist who may come along, have place a cop in charge of said machine, and proposes to maintain the speed limit of 30 miles an hour on its roads. Not a bad idea for this county to investigate.

ADD $10,000 TO DAMAGES ASKED

Plaintiff In Damage Raises His Demands From $10,000 To $20,000 In District Court.

MUCH BUSINESS IN SIGHT

Judge Clock of Hampton convened the November term of court on Monday There appears to be considerable business ahead.

The grand jury organized Monday with Thos. Durrant of Dows as foreman. The others are: A. E. Martin, Pink Trees, Hans Thompson, E. C. Paul, H. W. Ensign and I. D. McVicker.

The $10,000 damage case of John J. Larson vs. Gerhart Tegland, both Lake township farmers, has been settled out of court. The case grew out of an auto accident last year west of Clarion in which Albert Larson lost his life.

A new turn in affairs has taken place in the damage suit of Earl Strever against U. B. and Albert Tracy in which it was sought to recover $8000 for injuries sustained when defendant's auto collided with the Strever team on the cemetery hill east of Clarion a few months ago. The attorneys for the plaintiff have increased the amount of damages wanted to $20,000.

J. A. Cox, who has been confined in the county jail, has succeeded in securing an order from the supreme court for a hearing before Judge Clock claiming he is wrongfully detained in custody. He made a request Monday that forty jurors be used on his case, among them being President Coolidge. It is probable the condition of the man's mind will be examined. Late Tuesday Cox dismissed his case.

The Chapman Lumber Co., of Eagle Grove asks for a mechanic's lien upon a dwelling house of S. S. Westvold in that city. The amount of the account is $261.25. The same company also asks judgment of Westvold for $573.20 for other building material.

The Citizens State bank of Silver Lake, Minn., brings suit against Wm. Shangs to collect a note for $1500.

Curts Dilocker claims that he paid four insurance policies for S. S. Westvold of Eagle Grove, that he also brought about a real estate trade, and that he has received no compensation on any of the accounts. The sum of $729.27 for the above services is asked.—Monitor.

Berlin Heard On The Radio

This week is the time in which the American and European broadcasting stations co-operate in transmitting across the Atlantic. Lud Johnson tells us that Arthur Ruka reports hearing Berlin, Germany, on Monday night. Various other radio listeners report hearing Porto Rico and Mexico, but this holds the record for long distance. The test is being held all this week, beginning each night at 10:00 o'clock.

Celebrate 16th Anniversary

Supt. and Mrs. Rankin of Hampton, Mr. and Mrs. Tomkins of Garner and Mr. and Mrs. Hajo Pals of Swaledale were guests at the M. E. parsonage Tuesday helping Rev. and Mrs. O'Connor celebrate their 16th wedding anniversary. A very delightful afternoon and a delicious dinner in the evening were enjoyed.

Geo. Cram is reported as resting more comfortably the past few days. Last week Monday he slipped and fell at his home, breaking his hip. A couple of years ago he had the misfortune to break it, and the second break, combined with his age,

Of all the various "days" that America has to observe in some fashion or other thruout the year, there is one that to our mind stands out above the rest—Thanksgiving Day. It was the first "day" ever originated on this continent, and the Pilgrim Fathers had cause for giving thanks. They came to a new and a free land. The principles that brought them to American shores were the principles upon which our government was established, and under which we live today. We can be thankful, indeed, that we live in America. As the world stands today, that seems to us to be our one great privilege; a fact which we cannot sufficiently be thankful for.

There are no starving peoples in America as there are in Russia, in Armenia, in China. There are no homeless peoples here as there are in thousands of places in the old world. Americans are not attempting to face the long winter months with paper as clothing, with sacks for shoes, with shelter a question and heat unknown.

We have been truly the favored of God. American people have more than any other peoples; some less and some more than others; but all of us more than our neighbors over the seas. It will be a poor citizen of this God-given land who will not in all humbleness of spirit, render his thanks for the blessings which have been bestowed upon us as a nation, and for the privilege of living in it. And may we, along with our thanks, earnestly beseech that we may be favored with a continuance in the years to come of the Divine guidance and favor that made us and has kept us, a nation of freemen.

METHODIST CHURCH
(J. B. O'Connor, Pastor.)

A member of the church said to me the other day, "The church services seem so much more interesting and full of life when there is a large crowd." How true it is. They seem so much more interesting to the pastor, too. A large congregation was present Sunday morning and Sunday evening the house was well filled up Certainly it is very encouraging to your pastor to see the interest you are manifesting. Of course we realize that there are a few knockers who do not attend but their name is Few. And we know that no living mortal can please every one. But we thank God for the many faithful ones that constitute the backbone of the church.

We were disappointed Sunday evening in the fact that the Meeker orchestra was not able to be with us as we were expecting. We have heard nothing but the highest praise for the excellent cornet solo rendered by Mr. Shipley, who has proven to be one of the best cornet players in this section of the country. The anthem rendered by the choir of young people under the leadership of Mrs. Ray Klemme and directed by Mrs. Adolph Skovlin, was enjoyed by all.

WHY $20 A YEAR WHEN $46 IS POSSIBLE?

By weeding out the "boarders" and non-producive cows it is possible to greatly increase the revenue received from the individuals from your dairy herd.

The dairy cows of the United States average about 160 pounds of butterfat annually. Association records show that for such a cow the income over cost of feed is $20.00 while the average income over cost of feed for all the cows in the various testing associations studied is $46.00.

Why let this $26.00 per animal for the non-producer slip thru your grasp every year just because you have never tested out the individuals in your herd and eliminated the "boarders?"

Successful business men in other lines will not keep an employee who is a non-producer, why should you keep a non-producing cow?

Test your cow and find out the truth.

Livestock Shippers Convene

Shippers of more than one-third of the livestock that is marketed in Iowa, the cooperative livestock shipping associations, meet at Des Moines, December 10 and 11 for the fifth annual convention. The first day of the meeting will be held jointly with the Corn Belt meat producers, with a big banquet in the evening.

Among the speakers at the meeting will be E. G. Dunn, of Mason City, attorney for the Iowa cooperative livestock shippers, who led in the fight for cooperative elevators 20 years ago; F. G. Kentner, director of cooperative marketing for the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation and secretary of the Ohio Livestock Shippers; Peder Pederson of Cedar Falls, who will talk on the Danish cooperative marketing; O. J. Kalsem, president, and Knute Espe, secretary.

Suggestions for the coming year's program will be acted upon and officers will be elected for the coming year.

Good Food Is School Need

Food is one of the most important considerations for children during their early school years. Because of the change in their routine of life it is essential that there be a minimum of adjustments in the digestive apparatus. Regularity and simplicity are the watchwords, says Miss Ida M. Shilling, associate professor of home economics, the Iowa State College.

The time for meals should be adjusted to meet school needs. The child should be up and dressed in time to eat a substantial breakfast, because recent studies show that malnurition and no breakfast go together. The period between breakfast and the noon meal is too long for most children and a lunch both in mid-morning and mid-afternoon may be necessary. If the school serves this lunch it may be milk and crackers; if the child carries it from home it may be fruit or bread and butter. Candy should never be used. Irritability toward evening is often due to hunger.

Suggestions for the children's meals are given by Miss Shilling. For breakfast, stewed, canned or fresh fruit whole or cooked cereals; poached eggs; toast with real butter (better than a substitue), and milk to drink. For mid-morning lunch, fruit or milk and crackers are desirable. At noon the meal should be the most substantial of the day, and may include the following: meat if cared for; potatoes, fresh green vegetables and fruit or simple pudding for desert. For mid-afternoon lunch, fruit or bread and butter is good. Cereals, toasts, milk and stewed fruit are suggestions for supper.

Alfalfa Defeats Thistles

Trading a patch of Canada thistle for an equal patch of alfalfa is not a bad bargain, most farmers will agree. That is exactly what Jergen Anderson of Grattinger, Palo Alto county, did.

Mr. Anderson in 1922 had a large patch of Canada thistles in one of his best fields. They had resisted every effort of eradication. Finally in the spring of 1923 Mr. Anderson seeded the patch to alfalfa, with a light sowing of oats. The alfalfa was first cut for hay this year and the Canada thistles were entirely missing. They had been completely smothered out in one spring. Mr. Anderson says he'd just as soon raise alfalfa as thistles, anyway.

Fertilizer Coins Dollars

While unfertilized land across the fence from his land was raising poorly matured corn this year at the rate of from 25 to 40 bushels per acre, H. E. Kraft, of Walker, had a yield of 65 bushels to the acre, which with very little sorting will make good marketable corn. Commercial fertilizer did the business. Another of his fields nearby yielded 50 bushels, and all of it was sound corn. Meanwhile many of his neighbors had to content themselves with yields as low as 20 bushels to the acre.

Mr. Kraft used two kinds of commercial fertilizer, the one giving the best results being "1-8-3," composed of nitrogen, phosphorous and potash in relative proportions indicated by the numbers. Also he used "2-10-2" with good results. The fertilizer cost him about $30 per ton and he applied 100 pounds to the acre, making a net cost per acre of approximately $1.50. Increased corn yield paid for the cost of the fertilizer many times over in one year.

"Use of fertilizers in addition to making a much larger yield, also make the crops come to an early maturity," says H. W. Warner, soils specialist of Iowa State College.

Meetings In Norway and Pleasant

The Norway township farm bureau will hold its annual election of officers Friday evening, at 8, November 28 at the Norway township center school house. Township chairman, Harald Holm, and vice chairman Mrs. Leonard Evans, are arranging a program for the evening's entertainment. All of the members and their neighbors should turn out to the meeting.

On Friday, December 5th, at 8:00 the Pleasant township farm bureau will hold a meeting at the Center school house. A special program is being arranged by the local people and a good attendance will be appreciated.

You will secure the best results by advertising your farm sale in the Independent. Eighty per cent of farm sales in this territory are Independent advertised.

VISIT TO ROME THE ETERNAL CITY

letter S, winding in and out, a tortuous route. On either side in the city are embankments that are said to have cost the government $30,000,000 to build. While the channel in ordinary times is only about twenty-five feet deep, yet as the ages have come and gone it has had a habit of overflowing and causing great havoc and loss, establishing a record in 1900 of forty-five feet, when the water stood six feet deep in the old Roman forum, the people rowing around in boats in the Pantheon. The river has been described as "too large a stream to be harmless and too small to be useful."

Come to think of it, what a wonderful part in history rivers have played—the Jordan, in Palestine; the Nile in Egypt; the Tiber, in Italy; the Seine, in France, the Thames in England. We are glad to have seen all of them. Visualizing them in the distance, however, when once they come into your view the reality is scarcely equal to the actual, unless, indeed, it is the Nile. It isn't the fault of the rivers, however, they haven't changed. Historical associations have cast such a halo over them, their size and beauty have been greatly magnified.

The river Tiber, which flows so crookedly through Rome, have you forgotten the legendary history of this greatest of all historical cities and the part the Tiber played, for so often our forgetters fail us? Practically every high school student has read of how Romulus and Remus were suckled by a she wolf – but this is the legend in brief:

A Vestal Virgin, daughter of a king who had been expelled from his throne, bore to Mars, the God of War, twin sons. Those ancients were a little severe in those days with women who bore children out of wedlock, so, according to law, the mother was buried alive, but the twins were thrown into the Tiber, which kindly cast them ashore at the foot of the Palatine Hill, and a she-wolf happened along, gave the twins sustenance until a shepherd picked them up, took them home to his wife; they were reared in the shepherd's home being named Romulus and Remus, and following the occupation of shepherds. Later, becoming prominent, they restored their grandfather, Numitor, to his throne and decided to build a city near where they were cast up by the Tiber. In order to decide which should name the city, it was left to augury. Romulus stood on the Palatine Hill, while Remus was on the Aventine, about a half mile away. The agreement was that whichever saw the largest number of vultures in a given time was to be the winner. Remus reported first that he saw six, but Romulus, having the last guess, or possibly better eyesight, said he saw an even dozen, and so the city was called Rome and the building of the city was started right on this Palatine Hill, where Romulus sood when the vultures were counted. The legend still further has it that when Romulus died, he was carried to heaven in the chariot of his father Mars. You will note that even in this early legendary date, "the woman suffered while the man went free."

VISIT TO ROME THE ETERNAL CITY

This Palatine is undoubtedly the most noted hill in history. It is here "The history of the most powerful empire of the world has ever seen is indelibly inscribed in documents on the Palatine Hill, which to this day mark its modest origin in the time of the early settlers and of the kings, and the luxurious pomp of its imperial epoch. It is here that we are reminded most strikingly of many dark tragedies; the intrique of so many ambitious empresses; the causes of the decline and fall of one of the greatest civilizations the world has ever known."

It is the oldest and most aristocratic of all these hills, as it was also the site of the founding of the ancient city. History states that Romulus, when he had decided on a site, "harnessed to a plow a heifer and a bull without blemish and made a furrow to define its limits. He lifted the plow over the places where he was to have gates." Later came the buildings of the emperors. On the southern corner was the palace of Augustus and the palaces of the Caesars occupied the greater part of the hill. The Golden Palace of Nero and its grounds extended from this hill to the Esquiline. After the death of Nero the site of his palace was utilized for the Gardens of Adonis and it was in these gardens St. Sebastian, an early Christian hero suffered martydom in the first century of the Christian era,

Judith of BLUE LAKE RANCH

By—JACKSON GREGORY

COPYRIGHT BY— CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

In these days with women winning championships in outdoor games and athletic contests and successfully invading lines of endeavor that a past generation had set apart exclusively for men, is it not logical to have a heroine of fiction who takes a man's part in the management of a big enterprise and brings to bear the qualities of courage, coolness and daring especially called for in making the undertaking a success? It is decidedly logical, particularly in the West where girls on ranches are taught to shoot straight, tame outlaw horses, brand cattle and in general respects be qualified not only to take care of themselves, but to meet any exigency calling for judgment and nerve.

The boys of the Blue Lake outfit were pretty thoroughly disgusted when they learned they were to have a girl for a boss. Opinions changed, however, when a few of Judith's quiet exploits, performed under the stress of necessity and without any bravado or sacrifice of womanliness, proved her to be the best man on the big ranch. Judith did not seek the job of management. It was forced upon her through the death of her father and her realization that her foreman was a rascal bent upon wrecking the enterprise in the interests of a rival concern.

It was a stupendous job and the girl who could handle it successfully deserved to be the heroine of an exhilarating romance. Judith is decidedly welcome because she is a new type of heroine. She is all the more welcome from the fact that she is not an exaggerated type. There are plenty of girls in the West and elsewhere who, given such a grand old father to train them as Judith had, would be able to show the true steel which she exhibited; and, like Judith, would remain sweet and womanly throughout. Judith will win readers just as she won the Blue Lake boys. It is only fair to reveal that there was one of those boys who held out against surrender. He had old-fashioned notions of what a woman should be and what a woman can do. With the exception of Judith, he is the most interesting character in the story.

Synopsis

CHAPTER I.—Bud Lee, horse foreman of the Blue Lake ranch, convinced Bayne Trevors, manager, is deliberately wrecking the property owned by Judith Sanford, a young woman, her cousin, Pollock Hampton, and Timothy Gray, decides to throw up his job. Judith arrives and announces she has bought Gray's share in the ranch and will run it. She discharges Trevors.

CHAPTER II.—The men on the ranch dislike taking orders from a girl, but by subduing a vicious horse and proving her thorough knowledge of ranch life, Judith wins the best of them over. Lee decides to stay.

CHAPTER III.—Convinced her veterinarian, Bill Crowdy, is treacherous, Judith discharges him, re-engaging an old friend of her father's, Doc Tripp.

CHAPTER IV.—Pollock Hampton, with a party of friends, comes to the ranch to stay permanently. Trevors accepts Hampton's invitation to visit the ranch. Judith's messenger is held up and robbed of the monthly pay roll.

"Look here!" he exclaimed to Judith, before she had had time for more than a sweeping appraisal of his friends. "Why didn't you tell me you were up to a thing like this? Great Scott, Judith, you don't know what you are tackling, do you? Running a ranch like this—why, it's a big proposition for a thunderingly big man to swing."

"Is it?" smiled Judith.

Accompanying young Hampton were "Major" Langworthy, a little, short, fat, bald gentleman, who, so far as the knowledge of his club members went, had never been connected with any part of the army or navy, unless one counted his congenial brigades of cocktail drinkers; Mrs. Langworthy, his supercilious, uninteresting wife; Marcia, his languidly graceful daughter, in whom Hampton gave certain signs of being considerably interested; Marshall Rogers, the Oakland lawyer, and Frank Farris, the artist. Also Marcia's maid, and Hampton's Japanese valet, Fujioki. In due course of time this representative of the flowery kingdom grew to be great friends with Jose, the two forthwith suspected by Mrs. Simpson of all sorts of dark plots and of a racial sympathy which must be watched lest it produce "something terrible."

Pollock Hampton, holding a third of the shares of the big venture, with his legitimate claim upon a third of the income, was of course a factor which must be taken into account. Judith asked frankly how long he planned to stay.

"I'm here for good," he answered cheerfully. His explanation followed with a grin, quite as though he were telling her of some rare good news: "Money's all gone, creditors are nuisances, there's no prospect with you here of having you send me anything. What is left for me but to stay?"

Judith suggested a monthly allowance. Hampton laughed good-humoredly.

"Pay me to keep me out of the way? There's nothing stirring, Judith. Absolutely. I'm here to give a hand."

Judith had hopes, even yet, that a couple of weeks or a month of the

from a railroad would dampen and finally extinguish his bright enthusiasm. But swiftly those hopes died. This was his first visit to the mountains, and for a man sick of the city's social round, every inch of the ranch, river and cliffs and rolling hills had its compelling interest. Perhaps the thing which Judith overlooked was the blood of his fathers. For before Pollock Hampton, Sr., had made his money, he and his wife had been, like Luke Sanford, pioneers. Now something in the mountains here called vaguely to the soul of young Hampton and made him restless and stirred his heart. As he stood looking on while Bud Lee rode a bucking bronco, his eyes were bright and eager.

It soon became obvious that long ago Hampton had given freely of his admiration to Bayne Trevors.

"A great man!" cried Hampton warmly. "The only man I know big enough to swing a job like this."

To himself he said that the chief good he could do at the outset was to work to get Trevors back. With this in his mind and having had no full account of Judith's manner of ejecting the general manager, he went straight to her.

"Trevors is a friend of mine," he said lightly. "I'm going to ask him over to meet my guests. No objection is there?"

She looked at him keenly.

"Do as you please," was the cool answer. "I imagine he won't care to come."

Launched upon his first business venture, Hampton went to the telephone. That evening at the table he surprised Judith not a little when he said casually that Trevors had said he'd run over in a day or so, as soon as he could find time.

Mrs. Langworthy had no liking to bestow upon such as Judith. The girl, she confided every night to the major, was unladylike, unwomanly, outre, horsy, unthinkable, an insult to any woman into whose presence she came. The major agreed monosyllabically or with silent nods for the sake of peace. Personally he was rather inclined to fancy Judith's uncorseted figure, to admire her red-blooded beauty, and he always touched up the ends of his mustaches in her presence.

Judith, having early taken Mrs. Langworthy's measure, found an impish joy in murdering the proprieties for her especial benefit. She said "D—n" upon occasions when Mrs. Langworthy was there to hear; at table she talked of prize boars and sick calves and other kindred vulgar matters.

But the major admired her; Marcia, as days went by, proved to be a sweet-tempered, somewhat timid, but highly good-natured, affectionate creature generously offering her good-will; and Rogers, the lawyer, and Farris, the artist, both of the sophisticated, self-sufficient type, were little behind the major in interest.

During the last week of May, a rumor came to Judith's ears of which, at first, she thought little. Carson, coming to her upon a bit of ranch business, remarked dryly before taking his departure, that a report had got around among his men—Poker Face had mentioned it to him—that Blue Lake ranch was on its last legs; that it was even to be doubted, if the men ever saw another pay day before the whole affair went into a receiver's hands. Judith laughed at him and told him not to worry.

"Me?" said Carson. "I'm not the worrying kind. But ideas like that ain't good to have floating around. A man won't do more'n half work when he's wondering all the time if he's going to get his mazuma for it."

But, when again the rumor came, this time telephoned up to her from the Lower End by Doc Tripp, she frowned and wondered. And she was careful, upon the thirtieth of May, to send Charlie Miller, the storekeeper, into Rocky Bend for the monthly pay roll money. Charlie left for Rocky Bend in the afternoon, spending the night in town to get the customary morning start for the ranch. The men were to be paid at six o'clock.

Upon this same day Pollock Hampton told Judith that Bayne Trevors was coming to the ranch to have dinner, spending the night and the following day. Judith made no reply beyond favoring him with a quick look of question. She had not believed that the man would come. What next?

The last day of May came, and true to his promise, Trevors was a guest at the house from which, so short a time ago, he had been evicted. He dined there that night, cool and self-confident, casually polite to Judith, civil and courteous to the other guests, especially to Major and Mrs. Langworthy and Marcia, leading conversations unobtrusively, making being bound to a tree and pierced by arrows; this event has been immortalized by many fine paintings by noted artists. It was on this hill the Apostle Paul appeared before Nero, in the palace of the Caesars, being brought before the emperor in fetters, under the custody of an armed guard. The trial resulted in Paul's acquittal, much to his surprise, doubtless, considering the character of the tribunal before which he was tried and he was released from a lengthy captivity.

VISIT TO ROME THE ETERNAL CITY

It must not be forgotten that Palestine, which we have recently written so much about, was a part of the history of the New Testament, centers around Italy and especially in Rome. Paul died and was buried in Rome and his letter to the Romans was sent to a small congregation here. Here was the martyrdom of Peter and the greatest church building of the world is built over his tomb.

Northcote, writing of the burial of St. Peter and St. Paul, gives the following account of the vicissitudes of the burial:

"The two apostles were originally buried, the one at the Vatican, the other on the Ostian Way, at the spot where their respective basilicas now stand; but as soon as the oriental Christians had heard of the death they sent some of the brethern to remove their bodies and bring them back to the East, where they considered that they had a right to claim them, as their fellow-citizens and countrymen. These so far prospered in their mission as to the gain a momentary possession of the sacred relics, which they carried off, along the Appian Way, as far as the spot where the church of St. Sebastian was afterwards built. Here they rested for awhile, to make all things ready for the journey, or, according to another account, were detained by a thunder storm of extraordinary violence, which delay, however, was sufficient to enable the Christians of Rome to overtake them, and recover their lost treasure. These Roman Christians buried the bodies with the utmost secrecy, in a deep pit, on the very spot where they then were. Soon, indeed, they were restored to their original place of sepulchre, as we know from contemporary authorities, and there seems reason to believe the old ecclesiastical tradition to be correct, which states them to only have remained in this temporary abode for a year and seven months. The body of St. Peter, however, was destined to revisit it a second time, for a longer time period; for when, at the beginning of the third century Heliogabalus made his circus at the Vatican Calixtus, who was then pope, removed the relics of the apostles to their former resting place, the pit on the Appian Way. But in A. D., 257, St. Stephen, the Pope, having been discovered in this very cemetery and having suffered martyrdom there, the body of St. Peter was once more removed and restored to its original tomb in the vatican."

Thanksgiving Day

There's every reason to be thankful as you sit down to your Thanksgiving dinner, steaming turkey, and filling, and pie, and everything!

The nation generally, and each one in particular, can give thanks wholeheartedly for the progress and peace of our land this past year.

More people in this community than ever before can give thanks, too, for the fact that their growing bank accounts here are paving the way to gratified ambitions later on.

This Bank will not be open on Nov. 27, Thanksgiving.
